
The Students' Administrative Council (SAC) decided Wednesday night to hold a special meeting of U of T students on March 6 to ask students to vote on whether or not to support a proposed demonstration at Queen's Park on March 16.

Debate was heated as SAC reps discussed which approach to take to the U of T pre-demonstration rally.

With regard to the proposed vote by students at the rally, Engineering rep Tom Simpson said, "This is just a case of over-cautious student bureaucrats who want to cover their asses. I think we should support the demo at Queen's Park all the way."

External Affairs Commissioner John Doherty agreed. "Students don't have to come to a meeting to decide to go to another meeting. Students know what cutbacks are all about and they know they're going to get worse," he said.

University Government Commissioner Brian O'Riordan asked that the U of T rally be used to determine, in a vote, whether or not students really want a demonstration against cutbacks at Queen's Park. "It's time we sought out some grass-roots feeling on this," he said.

Michael Treacy, a student rep on Governing Council, said the demonstration was inevitable and that SAC might as well support it. "We should try to proceed on the basis that we are going to participate and are going to try to make it a success," he said.

Doherty asked that SAC reps vote for strong support of the Queen's Park demonstration not because it was going to happen in any case, but because SAC should try to make it successful. "I'm talking about endorsement. I want to see that people are actually going to do some work," he stated.

"Cutbacks are a central issue right now. It's not just a matter of SAC passing a motion," he added.

After the motion calling for a special rally at U of T had been passed, a second motion, calling on SAC to endorse the Queen's Park demonstration at the rally, was put.

The question, however, was left hanging when New College SAC rep Carl Symondson called quorum and it was discovered that the number of SAC reps had dwindled to 19, one less than necessary to continue the meeting.

In a telephone interview yesterday SAC president John Tuzyk said there may be a special SAC meeting to discuss organization for the U of T rally.

In an earlier item on the agenda SAC voted on two National Union of Students (NUS) motions dealing with the relationship between Canada and Quebec and the relationship between NUS and l'Association Nationale des Etudiants du Quebec.

SAC rejected the first NUS motion entirely. The student reps rejected, by a close vote, the part of the motion that stated "that NUS recognizes that Quebec is a nation and as such has the right to self-determination."

They also rejected a part of the motion which read, "that NUS, as the national representative of students in the remainder of Canada, state its belief that the interests of both Quebec and the remainder of Canada would be best met by the union of the nations of Canada in a commonly agreed upon state."

The second NUS motion received a nod of approval from the SAC reps. They agreed that NUS should recognize "l'ANEQ as the national union of Quebec students and that relations between the two organizations be undertaken on an equal footing, respecting the autonomous nature of both."

The results of the vote will be sent to Ottawa by Student Councils across the country. NUS will tally the results and arrive at a position.

The SAC earthball competition deflated rather suddenly.

A resolution recommending a reading knowledge of French as an exit requirement for the Faculty of Arts and Science was unanimously endorsed by the Academic Affairs Committee of the Governing Council last night.

The resolution read in part, "The Academic Affairs Committee believes that the University of Toronto must increase its commitment to expanding students' capacity to speak and write French. Past experience does not encourage the belief that a large segment of the students will reach competence in French without some form of requirement. The Committee feels that it is reasonable to expect of all Arts and Science graduates that they be able at least to read both official languages."

A number of members were of the opinion that the committee should not force the Faculty of Arts and Science to accept the French requirement. Professor George Reid of the Faculty of Education charged that the resolution contained "elements of authoritarianism" and that he was afraid of "negative reactions that were never intended, and certainly not wanted." In reply, History Professor Michael Marrus argued that Academic Affairs was "so unused to exercising (its) academic decision-making that the slightest decision is taken to be direction or authoritarianism."

Similarly, some members

deplored the "watered-down" quality of the motion. Committee Chairman Michael Bliss said that the Faculty of Arts and Science has avoided reviewing its admissions policy with regard to the language question and that as a result "if ever a faculty needed a directive, it is the Faculty of Arts and Science."

The final resolution stated, "It is of course the responsibility of the Faculty, not of this Committee, to determine which among the possible ways of moving towards this goal would be best, in keeping with the Faculty's other constraints."

U of T president John Evans was in attendance and strongly endorsed the resolution. "If the University of Toronto is going to play a national leadership role, it must demonstrate that it can take initiatives that may be unpopular at first but which may be farsighted in the long run," he said.

Evans observed that knowledge of both official languages was necessary if students are to "participate in the full spectrum of scholarly and leadership work in their country."

The motion also encouraged "all" divisions to "propose improvements in language training which are appropriate to the particular academic needs of their students."

This was strongly favoured by Engineering Dean Bernard Etkin, who noted that at the request of his students a French course would be included in faculty electives beginning next fall.

GSU stalls on Grad Post editor

By ANDREW MAHON

The controversy surrounding the Graduate Students' Union's warnings of dismissal against Grad Post editor Maria Horvath became even more acute Wednesday night after a tense five-hour meeting of the Graduate Students' Union (GSU).

At the beginning of the meeting a motion was raised to amend the agenda in order to deal with a letter from the Graduate Association of Students of Political Science (GASPS). The letter expressed strong concern for the freedom of the press and concern that "the current difficulties between the GSU executive and the Grad Post get an open hearing and general discussion."

The motion was defeated and the letter was placed at the end of the agenda.

When the question of the letter finally came up under other business GSU vice-president Leo Casey immediately remarked that the material in the letter should not be discussed.

"There are legal questions here," insisted Casey. The GSU executive is currently engaged in a grievance procedure with CUPE local 1281 on behalf of Horvath concerning the charges levelled against her.

"Confidentiality of the grievance procedure is such that on the advice of our lawyer we will not violate that confidentiality," added Casey.

GSU representative Barbara Stewart suggested that it was "unfortunate that the problem was not brought before the council."

"You're out of order," snapped Casey.

Because of the nature of the grievance, procedure now in effect between CUPE local 1281 and management (GSU), Union steward Peter Gallus warned that only questions of procedure could be discussed.

GASPS president Tom Kuhn emphasized that the GSU executive was supposed to be representative of the GSU members. He suggested that this was not the case in this matter.

Casey said that the incident was disturbing, especially what was printed in the Varsity.

The Varsity article dealt with Horvath's appearance before Ontario Regional Canadian University Press (ORCUP) to reveal details of the charges made against her by the GSU executive.

"Very little in that article is true" insisted Casey. "We've requested a meeting with the Varsity Committee and if the Varsity Committee does not deal with that, then it will be taken to Canadian University Press (CUP) or legal action will be taken."

Casey told GSU representatives to have enough good faith to trust their judgement. He assured members that their trust "would be vindicated in the end."

A motion was presented which said "no action of discipline or dismissal be taken against Maria Horvath by the executive without first bringing their recommendations to council."

Casey insisted that the motion "must be ruled out of order" because of the confidential nature of the grievance procedure.

Stewart then made another motion suggesting that the GSU endorse the letter sent by ORCUP to the GSU executive which warns the executive not to take disciplinary action against Horvath until the CUP investigation is completed.

"There is a legal process that has to be adhered to," maintained Casey and this motion was also ruled out of order.

Jones appeal quashed by Gov Council

By STEPHANIE ORTENZI

Student council vice-president Dave Jones became even further entangled in red tape when the Election Advisory Committee overturned on Feb. 10 his appeal against his invalidated Governing Council nomination.

The committee first rejected the advice of a Governing Council lawyer that it not listen to Jones' appeal on the grounds that the election guidelines had no provisions for an appeal on technical matters.

However, after hearing the arguments of Jones and SAC lawyer Barry Fisher and conferring in closed session, the committee emerged with the decision that "they could not hear an appeal because the nomination had been ruled invalid on technical grounds."

SAC University Government

commissioner Brian O'Riordan explained that in the case of an invalidity on technical grounds, the final say rests with the chief returning officer.

"The upshot is that the original decision was upheld... they could not entertain an appeal on compassionate or any other grounds," said O'Riordan.

The chief returning officer, Ross Smith, originally rejected Jones' nomination papers Jan. 27, the last day for Governing Council entries, because they lacked proof of citizenship. Jones was stranded by blizzard conditions in Vancouver and his papers were filed by O'Riordan 15 minutes before the 12 noon deadline but without the requisite citizenship papers.

O'Riordan has contended that the university had proof of Jones' citizenship in his student loan application and fees registration.

Fisher, representing Jones at the appeal, argued that the election guidelines contained "grey areas" and did provide for flexibility.

Jones, who said he was "very disappointed" by the committee's decision, concedes that the committee was put in "a difficult position." By deciding in his favor, "they would essentially be contravening areas of the bylaw."

O'Riordan said he was disturbed that the election guidelines are more inflexible than the Provincial Election Act. He said that obscure and ambiguous problems in elections occur yearly. He cited the Erindale student whose nomination was invalidated because his bus to the St. George campus was five minutes late.

Cutbacks committee plans attack

By CHARLES MEISTER

The U of T cutbacks committee, comprising U of T interest groups opposed to governmental cutbacks of grants to Ontario post-secondary institutions, declared its support on Wednesday for the planned March 16 rally at Queen's Park.

The committee also confirmed its intent to enter a coalition with protest factions at York University and Ryerson in the hopes of creating a Metro-wide and perhaps provincially based common front in dealing with government and university administrators.

The cutbacks committee, which includes representation from the Faculty Reform Caucus, the Students' Administrative Council (SAC), and the Graduate Students' Union (GSU), believes organized action on a mass basis is essential. This week's announcement that government operating grants to Ontario universities will increase by only 5.8 percent, well below the inflationary rate, has prompted representatives of these groups to seek the support and participation of their members.

Committee members agreed that the issues involved, such as the quality of education, layoffs for both academic and non-academic staff, cutting back of courses and larger classes, can only have a profound effect upon everyone at U of T.

Jean Smith, president of the U of T Faculty Association made a brief appearance and indicated that he expected that his association would support the planned demonstration. Professor Peter Fitting, UTFA executive member, said last night he would present such notice of motion to the UTFA executive next Wednesday.

The committee's tactics include the presentation of a 16-page brief countering the provincial rationale for cutbacks to the Governing Council meeting on March 16. The committee sees publicity as the key to their success, to "mobilize people at U of T." To this end in-class discussions will be organized, a poster campaign initiated, and extended media coverage solicited.

SAC President John Tuzyk expressed his desire that the March 16 demonstration enjoy a large turnout. U of T has been plagued by student apathy in recent years and SAC hopes to stem this trend, he said. The committee plans to release its own tabloid in an attempt to raise student awareness of the seriousness of cutbacks. In addition, a special issue of The Bulletin containing details of the U of T budget will soon be available.

U of T's custodial staff is viewed as a further source of strength which the committee is eager to recruit. But the leadership of the staff was cited as an unlikely ally. Committee members pointed out that "scare tactics" have been used in the past to restrain the active elements of this group. A suggestion was presented that the university be closed on March 16 to provide greater freedom for non-academic staff to participate.

Representatives from York and Ryerson at the meeting indicated that their respective institutions "have been hit hard" by cutbacks. Ryerson has to cut $5 to 7 million from its budget for next year with a resultant loss of up to 90 members of the teaching staff.

There will be a staff meeting on Friday at 2:00 pm. Topics on the agenda: Business manager, typesetting, Youthstream, RCMP and military ads, letters policy, elections policy and other business.

Western votes Yes to OFS

By ERIC STARKMAN

Students at the University of Western Ontario have voted to rejoin the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS).

In a referendum held concurrently with student council elections Feb. 15 and 16, a record turnout of 35 percent voted 2691 for, 1969 against continued participation in the organization it helped organize in 1972.

For OFS, Western's re-entry means 19,560 additional students in its membership as well as an estimated $27,000 increase to its treasury.

The campaign to get Western to re-join OFS was led by Bob Brack, student council president, and Chris McKillop, who is in charge of external affairs. In a telephone interview Brack told the Varsity that Western was "hurt by staying out" and that he could see no reason "not to be involved." He stated that he was "impressed by the personalities" at the OFS conventions and that it was definitely advantageous for Western to have a vote in OFS. (During the past year Western had representatives at OFS meetings but they were not allowed to vote.)

Brack said the dominant argument against Western's rejoining OFS was "Rep by pop." He said anti-OFS forces at Western contend that Western's interests would not be adequately represented at OFS meetings, since smaller institutions like Brock university, which has a student population of 2,499 students, have the same voting power as Western, with its student population of over 18,000. Brack said that anti-OFS people also complained that the federation was duplicating services that Western already had and that Western was in effect subsidizing these services for smaller institutions.

John Shorall, an OFS fieldworker based in Toronto, told the Varsity that "OFS is glad that they (Western) are back." He said that Western's re-entry means that OFS "can state our case much better" and that OFS "has much greater strength to influence the Ontario government."

Shorall stated the additional $27,000 from Western will give OFS a solid financial base and will cover this year's deficit. The additional funds will also mean that a full time chairperson will be hired, and that The Ontario Student, the OFS newspaper, will once again be published on a monthly basis.

John Doherty, OFS executive member and a SAC representative, was also pleased with Western's decision. He said that Western's re-entry means that "we are the only student voice" and that "the government has to deal with us if it wants to meet with university students."

The University of Ottawa, with a full-time student population of 10,000 students, is now the only Ontario university which does not belong to OFS. A referendum is scheduled to be held in two weeks. SAC president John Tuzyk said he was optimistic that Ottawa would vote to join OFS. He stated that the criticism from Ottawa is "that OFS is not dramatic enough in what they do."

Controversy over the Erindale College Student's Union (ECSU) dismissal of Blind Duck pub manager Paul Linklater is still unresolved.

Linklater was fired at an ECSU board meeting Feb. 6 because of alleged infractions against the liquor licensing regulations. Of the six board members, only ECSU President Bob Mowat voted against the decision to fire Linklater.

However, the legality of the board's decision at that particular meeting is still being questioned. According to the rules of order for ECSU meetings, the union committed a violation by allowing the chairman to vote. Furthermore, ECSU board member Doug Alcock voted despite a possible conflict of interest. Dineen Douglas, the sister-in-law of Alcock's girlfriend, was earlier hired as interim manager of the pub.

Furthermore, a taped interview made by the Erindale College radio station CFRE reveals that Dineen Douglas was approached as early as December 16 by an ECSU representative about the prospect of the new job.

The validity of the security reports, cited by ECSU as the reasons for Linklater's dismissal, have also been questioned. Erindale security had originally stated that a young woman was apprehended outside the pub after closing hours. The woman was intoxicated and carrying a bottle of beer that authorities assumed was from the Blind Duck pub. Linklater was fired Jan. 10 after a report of this incident was made to ECSU.

Shortly afterwards the same girl wrote a letter to ECSU stating that she was confronted by security personnel in the parking lot of a nearby residence, not in the vicinity of the Blind Duck. She stated that she was carrying an American beer when she was apprehended. American beer is not sold in the Blind Duck Pub.

As a result of these discoveries, Linklater was reinstated by ECSU, only to be fired again less than one month later.

Linklater did admit to one infraction of the province's liquor licensing regulations. During a Christmas party for the Blind Duck staff, drinks were still being served for two hours after the pub had closed. However, Alex Malcolm, director of Administrative Services for U of T and the pub's license holder, told CFRE Radio he felt that Linklater had done a "reasonable job" as pub manager. He added that he did not feel the pub's license was in jeopardy during Linklater's tenure.

The direct management of the pub is the responsibility of the ECSU board of directors. On Feb. 13, the next scheduled board meeting after the dismissal, a group of concerned students appeared to question the grounds for Linklater's dismissal. The board meeting was cancelled for lack of quorum.

ECSU President Mowat estimated that it cost the union approximately $1,000 to fire Linklater and hire his replacement. ECSU has engaged U of T Personnel Services to assist them in finding another manager to run the pub for the rest of the year. The Blind Duck pub, which seats more than 250 patrons, is currently paying its manager $250 per week.

Linklater has said he has no desire to pursue the matter. He has been unemployed since his dismissal.

Pol Ec plans cutback

By DAVID ZELDIN

Despite proposals for radical changes in Economics 100 for next year, there will be few if any new wrinkles next September.

Although plans were suggested last month either to restrict the first year economics course to those students with a minimum 80 percent Grade XIII average or to set up sections of 400 students, there will be open enrolment and class sizes will not grow beyond 200 students, according to Ian Drummond, chairman of the department of Political Economy. Drummond also said in a recent interview that the political economy department is trying to have the colleges fund a tutorial for the course.

The proposed changes were prompted by the possibility of cutbacks in funding for the political department next year. Although no department has a budget yet due to prolonged faculty salary talks, Drummond said he was not planning on a cut in his budget.

"We're flying blind at this time. We'll have to see what happens when we get our budget," Drummond said.

He also stated that the department would be unable to absorb a three percent cut and still function because 97 percent of the political department's budget is set and the chairman only has discretion with three percent of the budget.

"If we have to take a three percent cut," Drummond said, "we would be unable to print reading lists for next year."

Real food brought to Robarts

By BRIGITTE MERTLING

Rejoice all ye who enter here! Now shall ye indulge in the ambrosia of the gods — health foods, pure and simple, have descended on Robarts Cafeteria.

Derek Walsh of Triangle Vending describes the $10,000 operation in terms of improved service: "We're growing, and we had to do something to separate the machines from the cafeteria." As a result, the entire area is being renovated. All the machines will now be in a single room set apart from the serving tables and eating area. In the cafeteria itself, there will be serving tables with hot and cold foods and desserts, as well as a canopy with spotlights.

As for the actual food being served, Walsh foresees "different and upgraded foods, maybe roast beef sliced on the spot, and also health foods like apple juice, Dad's cookies, yogurt and chocolate bars."

The entire project will be financed by Triangle Vending. At present, about half of the improvements are already completed. The new vending room is almost finished and the main serving room should be ready in about 10 days. Walsh also promised that the coffee would continue to be hot.

ONTARIO TO ABOLISH CAPITALISM:

"Lack of economic expansion and other structural difficulties have conspired to limit opportunity for the young people who are our future. Any meaningful response to unemployment in general must be spearheaded by a direct attack on the problem..."

Speech from the throne.

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprises. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university.

The Varsity is managed by the Varsity Committee which is responsible for the management, financial policies, and editorial integrity of The Varsity.

An express function of the committee is to receive and consider complaints about the paper. Formal signed complaints — as opposed to letters to the editor — should be addressed to: The Chairman, Varsity Committee, 91 St. George St., Toronto, Ontario.

RESTRAINT FOR WHOM?

Sometimes the papers speak for themselves.

As the Toronto Star reported yesterday, "The Canadian dollar may be at depression levels, unemployment and inflation rates at worrisome heights, and over-all economic growth making like a snail, but Canadian industrial corporations chalked up their biggest quarterly profits in history in the last three months of 1977."

Remember Parrott's line at U of T that "we're living in times of restraint" and Trudeau's warning that we should lower our expectations? Some people are restrained more than others. And how often have we heard the lie that wage increases are the cause of inflation? But wages have been kept down by the "Anti-inflation" Board. Why then do we have an inflation rate comparable to pre-control levels and the highest unemployment level since the depression?

Marx and Engels wrote in the Communist Manifesto that bourgeois governments are nothing more than managers for the bourgeoisie. That was true then and it is true now. Trudeau's recent "bold" statements — that unemployment will control wages, that the unemployed have themselves to blame for their condition, that Canadians are soft — all these are bold in the sense that Trudeau was openly stating his class affiliation. Since the ruling class maintains its power by propagating the myth that it rules for the good of all, Trudeau's open championing of the exclusive interests of the capitalist class is indeed bold. Trudeau knows he can get away with it. The bourgeois press laps up anything he says and portrays him as a bold, resolute man who is willing to undertake decisive action to save the country. The "opposition", the labour movement, is consistently sabotaged by its own leaders.

U of T and apartheid

Did you know that your bank loans money to South Africa? The Bank of Montreal, the Royal Bank of Canada, the Toronto-Dominion Bank, and the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce have all been involved in international banking consortia that have currently loaned almost $3 billion to South Africa. The University of Toronto has $2.5 million invested in these four Canadian banks; an investment that must be challenged. Why? Because money loaned to South Africa ensures the survival of apartheid.

The Role of Canadian Banks:

Canadian banks have, by loaning money to South Africa, put forth a vote of confidence for apartheid. After black riots in 1970, multinational corporations were reluctant to reinvest in South Africa. The rate of investment in South Africa dropped and as a result, a recession ensued. This unstable political and economic situation in turn further discouraged foreign investment. It was at this time that the four Canadian banks cited above took part in a banking consortium that loaned $210 million to South Africa. This money helped bolster the South African economy, which in turn attracted renewed investments in the country. At the same time, military expenditures rose to stabilise the political climate.

Currently, loans to South Africa from international consortia in which Canadian banks are involved, amount to almost $3 billion. Multinational corporations (including some Canadian firms) continue to reap super profits. South Africa has the second highest average rate of return on foreign investment of any country in the world. Today we see that corporations are leaving Canada to increase their investments in countries like South Africa, leaving Canadians unemployed. It is not only the blacks in South Africa who suffer, but Canadians as well. Bank loans to South Africa protect foreign investments and actively promote the exploitation of black labour. Over the past ten years, foreign investment has increased while repression of blacks has intensified.

Economic decisions are not apolitical. The Prime Minister of South Africa, John Vorster, has stated publicly that "every new investment is a brick in the wall of our continued existence." Economic decisions made by Canadian banks, corporations, and governments do have political and social implications which are readily apparent in South African society today.

Bank Loans and the University of Toronto:

Why should this issue concern U of T students? The University of Toronto has $2.5 million invested in the Canadian banks which have made loans to South Africa. Last year a motion of censure was set before a subcommittee of the Governing Council. That motion was voted down. One of the questions raised at that time referred to the idea of the university as a politically neutral institution. I would like to point out that there are only two options that are open to the university, both of which carry political implications. By deciding not to censure the banks, and not to withdraw investments from these banks, U of T chooses to profit from the banks' continued support of apartheid. On the other hand, U of T could voice disapproval by actively divesting from the banks. The choices are clear cut: we either choose to defend or to challenge apartheid.

Another issue raised by the Governing Council was the extent to which the Council could speak for the university at large, because of the diverse political beliefs on campus. This is hard to believe. The university campus is united against apartheid. Informed citizens and groups all over the world have expressed their outrage over apartheid. South Africa is the only country that the United Nations has totally denounced. The Canadian White Paper on Foreign Policy states: "South Africa is possessed by the cancer of apartheid and Southwest Africa and Rhodesia have elements of both." The university is connected financially and politically to the federal government and taxpayers. Canada and its citizens have made their verbal position known. Let us put it into action.

Another question is raised by the issue of whether the Governing Council can speak on behalf of the university at large. To what extent does the Governing Council represent its constituency? There are 16 government appointees of which 13 come from the business sector, and only eight students on the Governing Council. Research has been done that shows links between the corporate interests of business people on Governing Council and investments in South Africa. These individuals do not represent the university community because of their outside interests. Can we trust this body to make important decisions on behalf of the U of T?

You may wonder what effect divesting $2.5 million from the banks would have on South Africa. Public pressure has forced several regional banks in the US and major banks in Holland to withdraw from consortia loaning to South Africa. This action denotes concrete disapproval of apartheid and calls all other foreign investment in South Africa into question.

The U of T Committee to Stop Bank Loans to South Africa has been set up by university students and faculty to educate people on campus about this issue. If you and/or your group want to remove your funds from the banks involved, or would like more information on bank loans to South Africa, contact the U of T Committee to Stop Bank Loans to South Africa through the GSU building.

On March 1 at Innis Town Hall, 8 pm., a forum will be held which deals with the question of Canadian bank loans to South Africa. Speakers include representatives from each of the following groups: labour, church, government, and the African National Congress.

U of T duplication

In his response to your article "Duplication Wastes Money", Mr. Strathy points out correctly that University of Toronto Press (UTP) is competitive with commercial suppliers of "instant printing". However, before one compares all such printing with in-house printing, it is important to differentiate between convenience copying and duplicating services.

UTP's duplicating services are competitive, not only with commercial suppliers, but also with in-house facilities, as Mr. Strathy confirms by instructing the Faculty of Medicine to take all orders for more than 300 copies of one original to UTP. He further supports this by having his announcement of in-house duplicating services and price list printed by UTP.

Independent studies have proven that convenience copiers should not be used for more than 25 copies of more than four originals. Hence, such convenience copying will always be an in-house operation, with which UTP cannot and does not wish to compete.

The printing which Mr. Strathy claims to be able to do for 20 percent less than UTP therefore covers the range of 25 to 300 copies. While it is quite possible that some university departments, including the Faculty of Medicine, can be more cost efficient than UTP, it is important, when such comparisons are made to take into account all costs such as equipment rental, supplies, staff, fringe benefits, back-up staff during vacations or sickness, maintenance contracts etc. In addition, volume is critical as most costs are fixed regardless of it. Failure to recognize "hidden costs" or meeting the minimum quantities under the rental agreement could jeopardize seriously any alleged cost effectiveness. It is therefore UTP's hope to take advantage of the economies of scale by fully utilizing its updated equipment, which incidentally provides printing rather than copying quality, and the back-up from its plant in Downsview in cases of overflow.

The only real measure is an ultimate true cost comparison, recognizing all costs, measured against the service required and UTP will be pleased to compare costs on this basis with any department which is in the process of reviewing its duplicating needs and equipment.

Trotsky and the USSR

Keith Raymond claims that the Trotskyist League has passed unfair judgement on Hubert Humphrey (Varsity, Monday, February 20). He fails to expand upon this, and declines to express his own views on the late, unlamented "Happy Warrior". As we have both stated and documented our assessment of this witch-hunting anti-communist's career in our newspaper, Workers Vanguard, (as well as in our reply in the Varsity, Monday, February 6 to Sean Dunphy's criticism of our headline, "Humphrey Dead 'at Last'"); we will not belabor the point here. It is apparent that the real purpose of Raymond's letter was to give vent to his anti-communist diatribe against Trotsky and the Soviet Union. He says that "Trotsky was instrumental in the creation of the harshest and most oppressive regime in history," and that we would not be allowed to express our opinions in the Soviet Union.

First of all, we do not think in terms of an abstract, class-neutral "democracy", but instead ask, "democracy for whom?" "Oppression" does not exist in the abstract. Society is class-divided, and the state has always been a tool for the oppression of one class by another. The Soviet Union of Lenin and Trotsky was "oppressive" for the exploiters of the working class and peasantry, for that ruling class which had created that chattlehouse of nations, the Russian Empire, and which thrust Russia into the imperialist war to further satiate their profit-hungry, colonial annexationist appetites. For these exploited, toiling masses, deeply oppressed nations and downtrodden peasantry, the Bolshevik Revolution was the greatest single event of human liberation in history.

Many of the freedoms enjoyed by the bourgeoisie in a capitalist "democracy" are also extended to the workers, provided they do not challenge or threaten private property, the basis of capitalist rule. These freedoms are conditioned by class rule. You have as many democratic rights as you can buy. "Freedom" of the press, for example, exists only for those who can afford access to a printing press. It means little to the masses when they are illiterate. "Freedom" of speech means little for the wage slave thrown out on the street for the slightest word of protest against his exploitation. Even these "freedoms" are tenuous and in no sense guaranteed. One has only to think back to Trudeau's 1970 imposition of the War Measures Act, or to the recent police raid on the offices of the Body Politic.

The Soviet Union is a degenerated workers state. This means that it rests upon proletarian property forms such as a planned economy, collectivized agriculture, and the state monopoly on foreign trade, which are in the historical interest of the working class. These property forms lay the basis for a transition to socialism. For this reason we unconsciously call for the military defense of the Soviet Union against imperialist attack or internal counter-revolution. At the same time, there is no political democracy for the Soviet working class. Any advance toward socialism is thwarted by an ossified Stalinist bureaucracy. It was under the impact of imperialist encirclement and military attack against the Bolshevik Revolution, an attack in which both the U.S. and Canada participated, that the revolution was subjected to extreme hardships. While the proletarian property forms remained intact, the Soviet Union underwent a political degeneration. A proletarian political revolution is necessary to sweep aside the bureaucracy and to restore workers democracy, both to better defend those gains that have already been made, and to extend them. This need for a political revolution illustrates the qualitative difference between a degenerated and a healthy workers state, which would be the dictatorship of the proletariat, and which, extended internationally would be on the road to the socialist future.

Both the socialist revolution against capitalism and the political revolution against Stalinism require a class-conscious proletariat led by a revolutionary Trotskyist party. This brings us to the role of Leon Trotsky.

Along with Lenin, he led the Bolshevik Party to the October Revolution in 1917, establishing the first workers state. This event was of great historical importance and was the first step toward the proletariat's conquest of power on an international scale. However, for a number of reasons, chiefly the lack of a mass revolutionary party in the other advanced countries, the revolution remained isolated. Coupled with the scarcity created by the devastation of the Russian economy during several years of war, this led to the growth of a bureaucratic stratum whose interests were expressed by Stalin. After Lenin's death, Trotsky led the struggle against Stalin, but was unsuccessful. Workers democracy was replaced by bureaucratic rule, and Trotskyists could no longer, as Raymond smugly observes, "present their opinions". This came about not because there was a socialist revolution in Russia, as Raymond implies, but because there weren't further socialist revolutions in other countries, especially the advanced capitalist states. One of the hallmarks of Trotsky's Fourth International was its programmatic clarity on the Soviet Union. It understood the need for defense of the gains of October and for a political revolution to sweep aside the usurpers of those gains. Today there are many similar states in Eastern Europe, China, etc.

We of the international Spartacist tendency stand in the tradition of the Fourth International, and for its rebirth as the party of world revolution. One of the tasks of that party will be to win the workers away from illusions in such phoney "friends of labor" as the now finally dead Hubert Humphrey.

People's war on smoke

We are writing this letter in an attempt to call forth some "peer group pressure," the stuff of legend and lecture in Sidney Smith Hall. Political Science 200 meets at 10 o'clock each Tuesday and Thursday morning in SS2102. Room 2102 is a large lecture hall and Pol. 200 is enrolled to capacity, such that when most people attend, a few end up sitting on the stairs. But to the point: there is one person who smokes during these lectures. Coincidentally, of the hundred or more regular attendants, this smoker is one of the three who are being paid for participation (while the rest of us have happily surrendered, in advance, approximately $6.00 per session). The name of this smoker is Horowitz; he is a T.A.

Now, if we were careless of others' feelings and mindless of public virtue, we might use this letter to call Horowitz an asshole. And if we were philanthropists with lots of time to play at bureaucratic maze-running, we might lodge a complaint at Simcoe Hall or even City Hall (although Toronto's much-publicized anti-smoking-by-law has yet to ensnare its first transgressor). But we are among the masses and fully infected with the apathy and awe of bureaucrats so ubiquitous among our colleagues. Comrades, Horowitz has been asked politely, begged and otherwise peacefully requested to cease from assailing the rights of the non-smokers in the course. He has responded with impunity: "service with a snarl," the new motto of the G.A.A.? What is to be done? Should this Horowitz be allowed to continue his assault on the comfort, health and concentration of others in Pol. 200? Those affected with the "infantile disorder" of direct action would presumably offer the most efficacious response this disgusting behaviour by bringing cups of water to the next lecture. Just as a single spark may ignite a prairie fire, so a single cup of water may extinguish a smouldering butt! People's war is the only answer.

As the SAC representative for Trinity College until just recently, I would like to comment on the approach SAC takes in granting project-aid. Project-aid is, ostensibly, the channel through which SAC funds worthwhile campus clubs and endeavours which provide services or a view point that SAC itself does not. Just recently SAC decided whom it would and would not fund for this term: eleven requests were granted and three refused.

Theoretically there is a set of criteria universally applied in making these decisions but in practice the degree of arbitrariness is appalling. The Trotskyist League, with whose politics you may or may not agree (I don't), was one of those refused a grant. However, their application met all the major conditions for grant acceptance. The rejection of funding ($100) to this group was simply because they hold a political view differing from that of SAC. Project-aid grant selection should be done by across the board application of the same criteria and not on the basis of SAC "solidarity" with the applicant. But instead of maintaining this modicum of democratic principle SAC contents itself with "serving" students by losing $500 every Friday at its pub and playing at petty bureaucracy. As I could no longer condone the anti-democratic conduct of SAC, I resigned.

Salary negotiations

Articles in the Monday and Wednesday edition of the Varsity on salaries included the following statement:

"Governing Council must now meet to decide on whether to accept the (mediator's) report's recommendations. If the report is rejected, the administration's final offer prior to arbitration (mediation) would automatically be implemented."

I wish to point out that the Memorandum of Agreement, under which this year's salary negotiations and mediation are carried out does not say anything regarding the situation that would exist if Governing Council were to reject the mediator's report. It is incorrect to state that "the administration's final offer prior to mediation would automatically be implemented." I believe that in this event we are back where we were last November when negotiations began, namely nowhere. I sincerely hope that Governing Council will not choose to go this route.

Regarding the benefits sought by the University of Toronto Faculty Association (UTFA) (the Varsity, Feb. 8), I must complain. The UTFA wants, among other things, "a special merit fund for librarians," "home improvement loan guarantee" and "extension of U of T's existing policy for free U of T tuition for academic staff to include their dependents." Now, a special merit fund for librarians sounds quite questionable, but home improvement loans and free university education for staff and their dependents is creeping socialism of the worst kind. If the U of T staff is underpaid, the University should give them the largest raise it can afford. But I see no reason why the dependents of staff or even the staff themselves should be exempt from the fees which everyone must pay for the privilege of higher education. Furthermore, I don't see why the university should have to help librarians and professors fix up their houses. Surely home improvement is not the responsibility of the University!

Our university staff should be adequately paid, but the university must not retreat into socialism the minute it hits hard times. That enervating attitude ought to be erased from our staff's union. MAKE THE PROFESSORS PAY FOR THEIR CHILDREN'S EDUCATION! STRUGGLE AGAINST SOCIALISM!

Macdonald report

It is unfortunate that Dr. Macdonald look it upon himself to recommend such extreme changes in the governing structure to accommodate a new role for the Governing Council. We can agree that a shift to the roles of Governing Council and the President suggested by Dr. Macdonald would be beneficial, but to make them the absolute roles does not recognize the benefits of the flexibilities and the informal mechanisms that exist under the present structure.

Dr. Macdonald's preconceived notion that the University have a strong President to provide the leadership needed has no place in a report on the governing structure. A structure that gives the President the absolute powers recommended in the Report in no way guarantees a strong leader. A more suitable structure would be less dependant on a strong leader, but if the University was blessed with one then the structure would allow him to exercise his abilities to the fullest. A structure that emphasizes the roles of the Council and the President but does not dictate them is best.

It is appalling that Dr. Macdonald discounts the findings of the previously adopted reports and recommendations on the Governing Council's role and structure. The breadth and depth and the energies put into the preparation of these previous reports exceeds that of the Macdonald Report. He cites the particular environmental pressures of the times in which these reports were made as sufficient reason to discount their findings. Yet, his own report has been made in an environment of the constant whining of a teaching staff estate that no longer has control of the legislative process of this University. This is indeed unfortunate.

Quiet please

Libraries are to study in. We rhythmically sway our eyes to the irregular tempo of commas and periods and so lull ourselves into a mental oblivion until woken by a suppressed snuffle or cough. Or we scratch homogenized knowledge on overprinted paper in expectation of recognition for our meritorious effort. But all the same, the ritual of study has its mores and norms, rigidly structured like those endless rows of linear knowledge that some have sought to know. Sartre's hero succumbed to the role and greatly admired his counterpart until reality ejaculated into the pompous air.

To move beyond the polemic, my bitch quite simply is that the library has become a recreational hall. In lieu of spending untold fortunes on changing rooms and squash courts with sanitized ceilings the University should have converted Roberts into the tallest free-standing gymnasium and rec. centre for students in Canada. (My initial impulse was to qualify students, but saying undergraduates would have put unwarranted limitations on the cancer of ignorance.) Thus the relative merits of Guy Lafleur and Ken Dryden could have been discussed by the eminent scholars of the Labatts Blue school of thought in the calmest serenity of the History Reading Room, or the ethics of whistling as opposed to panting when confronted with an object that, in Heferian thought, can only be related to as less than a whole donkey, "a piece of ass". And those Government of Canada proteges studying biology and the tips of Players are not to be forgotten.

Quite simply I'm running doggedly through the maze of recycled knowledge seeking desperately to find an oasis where I might escape the staccato of potato chips and enter the intellectual oblivion for which I have already paid the entrance fee. So you idiot bastards out there, meet me behind the D stacks and here's ink in your eye.

Motion II

Whereas the position of editor should not include administrative details that detract from his/her ability to oversee the content and production of the paper, And whereas the Varsity has had to rely in the past on editors whose financial expertise may not have been equal to the demands of the paper, or on a member of the Varsity committee who happened to have such expertise,

And whereas such expertise must be guaranteed on an ongoing basis,

And whereas the sound business management of the paper would further strengthen the paper's autonomy from the student council, and would be an excellent first step towards independent levy and complete financial autonomy from SAC:

Be it resolved that the Varsity hire a business manager for the year beginning April 1978 and she/he have the following responsibilities:

- A) the preparation and regulation of the Varsity budget, to include such tasks as,
 - i) the regulation of purchase orders for photo and other supplies.

Drug monopolies push pill

By SEAN DUNPHY

The medical profession, drug companies and the industrialized nations are guilty of "a wholesale assault on the genitalia of Third World women" through birth control programs, said Susan Cole, a researcher for the Women's Health Organization. Cole was speaking before about 60 people on "The Politics of Contraception" at the Med Sci auditorium Tuesday night. The talk was part of "Sexuality Awareness Week" sponsored by the U of T Sex Ed. Centre.

The contraception program has been concentrated in Latin America and carried out principally by the American-sponsored Alliance For Progress. The program, she said, was part of a backlash against rising populations in the Third World when developed countries began fearing that rapid growth would consume too much of the world's resources.

Cole said the policy ignores the massive disparity in per capita consumption between developed and under-developed countries. The campaign has led to massive sterilization programs which rendered 35 per cent of Puerto Rican women of child-bearing age sterile in 1965, according to Cole. She said that although the women consented to the operations, the immediate conditions deprived them of free choice — doctors were paid "bounties," and the women were subjected to massive doses of government propaganda, Cole said.

Cole said that in addition to sterilizing Third World women, drug companies have been using them as guinea pigs. The IUD and the Pill were both developed after extensive testing on Third World women. She also said that contraceptive drugs which are banned in North America are "dumped" in Latin America by the American drug companies which manufacture them, despite known health hazards, in order to make a profit.

Canadian women are also victims of these multinational drug companies, Cole said. The drug cartel charges women 2.5 times the profit margin on the Pill (which 44 per cent of Canadian women take). The cartel's vested interests prevents them from doing research into a safer contraceptive than the Pill or into possible side effects of the Pill.

Cole said that the government does little to fill the gap left by the drug companies. They fund a small amount of private research, she said, and they have a program whereby doctors report all adverse reactions to these drugs on government forms. "Adverse reaction cards" as they are called, are known, however, by only a small number of doctors since there is no advertising for this service.

Ireland and Quebec

By MARIO CUTAJAR

"Every moment for social change in Northern Ireland starts as a liberal, 'British' movement and turns into a renewal of the national struggle," said Gerry Foley, a member of the American Socialist Workers' Party, at a Friday night Socialist Forum organized by the Revolutionary Workers League-Young Socialists.

The Irish civil rights movement, Foley said, started 10 years ago. At that time the struggle was seen as a struggle against an anachronistic system of civil law. An artificial division developed, according to Foley, whereby the question of national liberation was downplayed by civil rights activists and made the central objective by Republicans who regarded the push for social reform as a diversion. This division, Foley said, was overcome as the civil rights activists discovered that the acquisition of civil rights depends on national liberation.

The struggle in Ireland has appeared as a fight between Protestants and Catholics, he said, because Catholicism is the only Irish national feature that has escaped obliteration by British imperialism.

Foley explained how in order to maintain its domination of Ireland, Britain has been forced to keep alive inefficient industries like shipbuilding and to spend large sums of money on welfare payments. With a 30 per cent unemployment rate among Catholic men some people in Northern Ireland have survived all their life on welfare, Foley said. Why maintain a system that is so wasteful? Foley argued that this is necessary because no indigenous capitalist class can take over if the British leave and because any large-scale social upheaval in Northern Ireland would quickly spread to Britain. Consequently, he said, the British have to prevent the situation from boiling over.

Although the civil rights movement started to wane after 1972, it is now starting to come alive again, according to Foley. "Illusions have been worn out," he said.

Following Foley's speech, Brett Smylie, leader of the RWL, drew some parallels between the situation in Ireland and that in Quebec. He contrasted the notions of national unity and state unity between different nations. Since Canada is a country composed of several nations, he said, unity in Canada must mean state unity. According to Smylie the unity in Canada since confederation has been a unity enforced by force of arms. Smylie compared it to the imperialist domination of Ireland by Britain. He cited Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau's New Year's Day speech in which he threatened to "use the sword" against Quebec if it separated from Canada illegally as an example of the methods that have been used to unite Canada.

During the question and answer period, a representative of the Socialist League challenged Smylie's assertion that Trudeau would not hesitate to use the army in Quebec. What is needed, he said, is a new constitution. A member of the Trotskyist League attacked the organizers for "going beyond supporting the principle of self-determination and endorsing bourgeois nationalism." He also condemned IRA "communal terror," saying that the "orange and green" has to be replaced by the "red flag of proletarian revolution."

As fate would have it that same night an IRA bomb in Belfast killed 14 people and injured several others.

Rally at Queen's Park? You decide.

Are you going to put yourself in the picture?

*CUTBACKS

The funds available to the post-secondary system for next year have just been announced. They do not come close to meeting the effects of inflation, according to even the government's own advisory body. This will mean even larger classes, fewer tutorials, further reductions in library service and higher academic incidental fees. Aging equipment will rarely be replaced, course offerings will become further restricted.

*UNEMPLOYMENT

Student proposals for expanded summer job creation, and requests for action with respect to the employment situation facing graduating students, have not received a positive government response.

*STUDENT AID

Since the new student aid proposals were announced, students have negotiated with the government to make necessary improvements, those negotiations involved meetings with the Minister, Dr. Parrott, Lobby Day and culminated with the recent OFS meeting with the Cabinet. The government refuses to budge on limiting eligibility for grants, thus cutting 20% of those currently receiving grant assistance, and making graduate and professional schools accessible only to those that can afford them. As well, Dr. Parrott has refused to make public the parental contribution table, although he admits it is prepared. Could this be because the expected parental contribution will be even more unrealistic than it is now?

*WHAT DO WE DO?

In light of these developments, University of Toronto students must now consider their future course of action. Students at York, Ryerson and Glendon have decided that the only alternative left to them is a rally at Queen's Park to show opposition to government policy. SAC has recommended to its membership that University of Toronto students endorse this action and participate in it.

But the final decision is up to you. The meeting on March 6th would allow for discussion of our response to the government, and will decide whether or not U of T students will endorse the rally at Queen's Park and work towards its success.

Since no one will let me print the only funny thing I have written all year, I will be my usual boring self instead. Sorry. That's the way it goes.

Thanks this week to the usual crew of heavies. Apologies to Jennifer Carstens, S. Gilbert, Ann Prince and Julia Bennett. Next week, I promise.

Yes, it's a little fact, but a long time ago Ireland was populated by deformed football players and dwarf geisha girls. Irish playwright Y.B. Yeats reveals all in his play The Celtic Hero. Pass over to page 20 for the shocking details.

Now that Joe Namath and O.J. Simpson have given up football, an acting career seems in the works. Here they are seen in Power-drill, a new social-realist documentary ballet on the role of transvestites in coal mining. Based on the story of A Midsummer's Night Dream, turn to page 16 for a review of the premiere during the National Ballet's gala performance.

Cuthbert Pepzi, world-famous eccentric cola-nut importer, is the hero in a new Japanese sci-fi film. Here he is being attacked by giant screwdrivers. Riveting. Directed by Wim Wenders. An American Friend is reviewed on page twelve.

Kain excels in Sleeping Beauty amidst Nureyev's plush re-make Rudolf Nureyev's version of The Sleeping Beauty ballet, with which The National Ballet of Canada opened its spring season at O'Keefe Centre on February 8, is pure pageantry. It's the Miss America of the classical ballet — the difference being that you know from the outset which woman gets the crown.

Patterned after the original The Sleeping Beauty by Marius Petipa, Nureyev's production includes what is possibly the greatest technical challenge for the female principal dancer, the Rose Adagio. Princess Aurora stands in attitude derriere on point while four would-be suitors consecutively turn her around; between revolutions she stands unsupported and raises her arms to form a crown. The Nureyev production also features a more basic test for key dancers: it's difficult to create a memorable impression in view of the sets and costumes by Nicholas Georgiadis.

Georgiadis' designs are sheer opulence, a visual extravaganza whose total calories fattened the cost of The Sleeping Beauty to over $350,000. Rich brocades and velvets, heavy folds of drapery, long plumes and massive columns, all dusted generously with old gold, compete with the dancing for our attention. The designer's spectacularly obese vision threatens to overwhelm at every turn and it's only the kind of high calibre dancing by central participants found on opening night that saves this production from becoming a veritable plethora.

From the moment she entered in Act 1, Karen Kain not only embraced Princess Aurora as completely her own but also brought all the varying elements of the story into brilliant focus. Radiant and assured in her technique, she captivated as much with her old standards, impeccable ballon and phrasing, as with the joyous, heady abandon that carried her along from one sequence to another. Everything from clean, spirited jetes to exquisitely wrought slower progressions on point had a pleasing, unforced vitality.

She renewed the fascination with each pivot and virtually enkindled the audience with her interpretation of the Rose Adagio, measurably altered since last year. Kain held her pose a few heart beats longer between each revolution which simultaneously enhanced Princess Aurora's budding sexuality and increased our anxiety.

Emerging in the ballet's second act, Frank Augustyn surfaced as a significantly bolder and more confident Prince Florimund. Through thoughtful placement of the arms, in the tradition of the great male danseurs, Augustyn added elegance. Moreover, by graduating all his movement with superb ease, a definite progression for Augustyn, he took on a fresh vigour that acutely matched Kain's energy.

Another delight on February 8 was Ann Ditchburn's Lilac Fairy, which is a non-dancing, character part. Ditchburn ensconced herself as the grande dame of all fairies the second she swept luxuriously onto the stage. Barbara Szablowski's frail version the following evening lacked weight and was pale by comparison.

It was unfortunate then that Ditchburn's foil, Carabosse, danced by Lois Smith, failed to provide a strong contrast. Smith, a former NBC prima ballerina, was making a come-back in this character role and she looked too thoroughly tickled to be back on stage.

That sort of thing is fine if you're performing for your friends. However, I'd venture that there were a lot of people in the audience to whom the name Lois Smith meant very little. Consequently they were left puzzled at how this gentle, smiling lady had induced so much fearful cowering. The following evening's audience had no such problem with Victoria Bertram's aptly wicked Carabosse.

Although their performances occurred on a stage replete with distractions, Thomas Schramek and Mary Jago as the Bluebird and Princess Florine were swift, lively, and etched themselves deeply into memory. Jago, who takes this demanding and complicated role to great heights, was replaced by Esther Murillo the following night due to a minor injury. Murillo's Florine was also very delicate and precise but her pirouettes lacked the spirited elasticity of Jago's.

Opening night's performance was beset with unfortunate technical problems and during the prologue members of the corps often traipsed a second or two behind the music. Whereas these aspects were ironed out the following evening, the Kain-Augustyn performance remained more striking than that of Peter Schaufuss and Vanessa Harwood who filled the lead roles on February 9.

Dancing Prince Florimund for the first time, Schaufuss uncharacteristically appeared ill at ease and lacked polish. He performed the Prince's great solo of the second act adequately but without the expected Schaufussian dash and assurance.

Truffaut does some fancy leg work

No one who's never bruised his nose on a lamp post while his attention was on the woman walking ahead of him has any business reviewing, or even going to see Francois Truffaut's newest exercise in cinema without plot The Man Who Loved Women. Well I have this bruise above my left eye which bears witness to an unexpected elongation of my attention span at the corner of Jarvis and Wellesley. With that badge of honour, or something, I feel amply qualified.

The centre of the film, Bertrand (Charles Denner), is entering what psychologists are fond of labelling 'the dangerous years'. That is he's somewhere between 40 and 45. On the other hand he seems to have been there all his life. The flashbacks to his childhood reveal a precocity, in the way of aesthetics, which few of us can boast. His mother criticizes him for fraternizing (if that's the word) with those "flat-bottomed things" but young Bertrand is liberal. Later in the film he remarks that slim ankles are to be desired but that a more fleshy one indicates an admirable solidity further up. His opinions on the subject of breasts are equally catholic although smaller ones are more suitable in summer than in the colder months.

In short, although he has the French gifts of ratiocination and taxonomy, Bertrand's interests comprehend a remarkably large percentage of the world's female population. Women are admirable simply because they are women. Some reviewers have complained that most of Bertrand's amours are conducted with women who do not measure up to some arbitrary and exalted standard of cinematic beauty, which is, of course, the point.

And yes, Bertrand's activities extend to rather more than looking. That part of his life is, however, downplayed. For a film about sex one sees remarkably little of the unclothed female anatomy. The film's women are seen as Bertrand sees them, first as visual phenomena and second as characters. And, if we are being honest about human contact that's about the way it goes. No one who has been granted sight can honestly claim to 'see' a person's character before they see their body. We may not consider this an ideal situation but, as our friends the phenomenologists will tell us and tell us, that's all we've got.

Which is not to say that this is not a film more likely to be enjoyed by men than women. I suspect that most women are more easily bored by hours of skinny ankles than I am. I also suspect that Truffaut's small but unerringly acute insights into the activities of male eyes might be lost in translation (comme on peut dire).

Structurally the film works on very much the same lines as Truffaut's last film Argent de Poche. It is composed of vignettes, anecdotes, situations and Bertrand's quasi-philosophical musings on his obsession more than a few of which will make a grown boy cringe, things one might have thought but would never have had the gall to say out loud or even, depending on one's level of sophistication, sub-vocalize.

In the end a comparison with Argent de Poche is probably the best description of the film. If you find women's legs nestling closer to your heart than cute kids, The Man Who Loved Women is worth the ticket, if not...

Yo-Yo's show by no means so-so

February has been a great month for cello enthusiasts. Not only have we heard Sonatas and Variations of Beethoven performed by Tsuyoshi Tsutsumi and Elyakim Taussig in the Beethoven at Hart series, but we were also treated a week last Sunday evening to a varied program performed by 22-year-old cellist Yo-Yo Ma and pianist Samuel Sanders.

Beginning with arrangements of chamber music by Francois Couperin, both performers demonstrated a fine balance and feeling for the delicacy of the music and its ornamentation. Ma achieved a beautiful tone and lyricism in the Prelude and Plainte without lapsing into an overly romantic interpretation, which is often a temptation with these deceptively simple and melodious pieces.

The performance of the Sonata, Op. 65 by the late Benjamin Britten, was an exciting one that brought out all the whimsy and fun in this rather entertaining work. Sanders proved himself a capable partner to Mr. Ma, as both worked closely together throughout the five movements of the work. Balance for the most part was excellent, except in some of the more frantic piano passages which threatened to drown out the lower reaches of the cello line. This is a switch for Sanders, who in previous performances with Rostropovich tended to play too quietly. Ma seemed to be at ease with the technical demands made of him, including the quadruple stops of the Elegia and the breakneck pizzicato passages of the Scherzo. Perhaps the most breathtaking moment in the work was the concluding section of the Marcia with its presentation of the opening material in slithering harmonic double-stops.

The second portion of the program dealt with more familiar works. The Variations on 'Bei Meannern, welche Liebe fuehlen' from the Magic Flute, by Beethoven is a piece in which both instruments are perfectly balanced in their presentation of melodic material. Both performers played with clarity and precision, and achieved an effective contrast in the bold minor harmonies of the slower fourth variation.

The work which piqued the interest of most listeners was the final work on the program, the Brahms D Minor Sonata for Violin, transcribed for cello by Mr. Ma. The piece seemed to me to lose much of the passionate quality I associate with the violin version, and at times Ma's upper register seemed a bit strained. Nevertheless, much of the excitement built into the score was not lost — I think particularly of the sustained 'A' pedal in the development of the first movement and its reappearance on 'D' in the recapitulation. Both performers generated the same kind of excitement in the final Presto agitato, but perhaps the most successful movement of the three was the middle Adagio and its contrasting section in f-sharp minor. One of the many notable features of Ma's playing is his ability to draw an unusually rich and singing tone from his instrument. This quality came through both in the adagio movement and in the two encores, one of which was a simple but hauntingly beautiful folk-melody.

The Goodbye Girl is Neil Simon's newest formula film comedy, directed by Herbert Ross of Turning Point fame. The picture is witty, romantic and optimistic, apparently just cause for the film's popularity, with the masses and the media.

Reputedly an anniversary present for Marsha Mason, Simon's wife, The Goodbye Girl is much more a showcase for Richard Dreyfuss, the most unlikely, yet perhaps the brightest star to hit the screens of the seventies.

Set in New York City, Simon's favourite battleground for his comical human dilemmas, the story features Mason as Paula McFadden, a thirtyish ex-dancer who is unceremoniously abandoned by her boyfriend, a macho actor named Tony DeForrest. Not only are Paula and her ten year old daughter Lucy left almost penniless but also virtually homeless. Tony's parting blow was to sell the lease of their apartment to a new tenant.

Enter Dreyfuss as Elliot Garfield, prospective tenant and actor with prospects, who arrives one rainy late night to take possession of the flat. After an exhaustive session of verbal volleyball, the sparring, Paula and Elliot reluctantly agree to share the place.

The ensuing situations involving the incongruous threesome offer almost limitless potential for comedy, romance and pathos, although Simon tends to milk the screwball comic scenes.

Elliot turns out to be a fanatic health nut who strums the guitar in the buff and meditates noisily every morning. "My body is a temple and I am worshipping it," the paunchy Elliot proudly announces.

Paula too has her share of neuroses, having been dumped first by her husband and later by her lover. Faced with earning her own living again, she attempts to coax her flabby muscles into shape in order to go back to dancing. "I'm thirty-three and I can hardly walk anymore," she complains.

Quinn Cummings as the precocious Lucy proves to be a catalyst for the film's funnier sequences. Although Paula describes her as "born twenty-six", Lucy is fortunately not one of those world-weary, wise-cracking brats who usually represent an adult's cynical view of children. Despite her reaction to Tony's underhandedness: "He rented the apartment? What a shithead!" Lucy is far from being the typical hostile little adult. Her developing relationship with the wacky Elliot is touching and funny, and perhaps even slightly Oedipal as romance blossoms between Elliot and Paula.

David Walsh's camerawork in the film primarily serves to enhance the comedy in the scenes. Extreme closeups through peep-holes and close-ups capturing the actors' double-takes and exaggerated expressions especially provide amusing touches. The faces of the scrubby Elliot, the cold-creamed Paula or the spaghetti-coated Lucy may not be particularly attractive, but they're both humorous and human.

Critic Pauline Kael calls Simon "official jester to the middle-class mass audience", and she's right. Everyone knows that Simon is a first-rate gag writer who long ago perfected the craft of producing punchy one-liners. But why does he have to prove it so often and so laboriously in The Goodbye Girl? Witty repartee spouted by skilled actors does not make a completely satisfying picture. Although the characters all display a certain vulnerability, they lack the potential depth and development which could have lent substance to the film without detracting from its razor-sharp wit and screwball antics. Everything in Simon's word is just a little too explicit, a little too pat and polished and superficial.

Nevertheless, The Goodbye Girl promises flashy, frothy and fun entertainment and any Neil Simon fan will be well pleased with his latest effort. "I'm a sucker for romance," remarks Paula during the film. I might also add that nearly everybody's a sucker for a Simon romantic comedy.

An American Friend: 70's rebel without a cause

Wim Wenders has already made at least two gems. The goalie's Fear of the Penalty Kick and Wrong Movement (which I consider the best film to have emerged so far from the new German cinema). Now comes his latest, The American Friend, opening tonight at the Fine Arts.

This is the one that didn't win at Cannes last year despite its being a hot tip. Perhaps the jury felt they couldn't give the prize to Wenders two years running.

All the Wenders trademarks are present, except that now he has taken the auteur theory to its limits: half the actors are themselves film directors and it becomes a game to spot them (don't forget Wenders in the cameo role of a mummified body). More than a game, it's something we are meant to know and are told in the end, so that it functions as a sort of collective signature, signifying in part that the film is also about film. It is a thriller that pays homage to thrillers in general and, in the train murder, to Hitchcock in particular.

The American Friend bases its plot on Patricia Highsmith's novel

Ripley's Game, though, as in the novel, some strands go back to her previous Ripley book. I don't think knowing the book helps in unravelling the plot. Wenders uses the thriller as a pretext only — clarity, plausibility and logic are not what matters. His plot gets thinner rather than thicker in time.

THE COWBOY IN HAMBURG

Dennis Hopper plays Ripley in a cowboy hat. "What's wrong with a cowboy in Hamburg?" he asks early on. Ripley is the maverick American whose shady operation at the moment consists of peddling paintings by a supposedly dead artist called Derwatt (Nicolas Ray), now holed up in his New York studio. At an auction in Hamburg Ripley's path crosses that of Jonathan Zimmerman (Bruno Ganz), a picture framer and restorer. Zimmerman is Swiss, and like Ripley, a marginal man. The other plot strand concerns a mafioso (Sam Fuller) whose main business seems to be porn movies. A Parisian associate of Ripley's, Reeves Minot (Gerard Blain) wants to eliminate someone (we don't know why) without implicating himself. By chance Ripley hears that Zimmerman is suffering from a fatal blood disease, and that he has a wife and child to provide for. Minot offers money and medical treatment in return for the murder. Jonathan accepts.

A WORLD OF VIOLENCE

The film inverts the intricacies of plot into a subjective exploration of an ordinary man's predicament when he, with the best intentions, is drawn into a world of violence and evil. As for Ripley, Wenders makes him into a hero of our time, rootless, nihilistic; after all, Hopper, who plays the role with a ravaged, schizoid intensity, first appeared as the rebel without a cause (directed of course by Nic Ray). Here he languishes alone on red silk sheets, talks into his tape-recorder, photographs himself obsessively (cf. Alice in the Cities), or plays pool in a room filled with the detritus of American culture. The whole effect is stagy, I assume deliberately, which raises an important point. These objects, the trains, the cinematic paraphernalia and so on, are so many stage props with which Wenders' films toy. It constitutes, I think, the strength of Wenders' appeal; it also marks it as a very German kind of protest.

Jonathan is morally implicated even while he wants to count himself out. Three times Wenders' camera swoops away in a spectacular helicopter shot, twice of the train Jonathan is on, once of his isolated apartment in Hamburg. An old friendship develops with Ripley, almost as the sole positive value in this darkling world. Wenders' films often ruminate on the male role, and here it is male bonding that is considered and then rejected (a rejection too of the values posed by certain American directors perhaps).

WENDERS' U.S. DREAM

In Kings of the Road someone says "America has colonized our subconscious," and as usual Wenders trends the ultimate frontier between countries whose cultures have become totally homogenized. The American friend is also the enemy. Other Wenders' obsessions are here as well: American music (less than usual), travelling, rivers which act as barriers as much as leading finally (as this film does) to the sea, loss of identity, a child's innocence, violence, a nameless fear (nothing to fear but fear itself' says Hopper). A danger that Wenders increasingly runs, as all frontiers dissolve in the sea, is banality. The American Friend keeps up the tension by its style, by suspense, and by some fantastic photography of Hamburg, Paris and New York, photography which maintains a sense of locale in the face of the facelessness of airports, highways and multi-storey hotels, providing beautiful colour for the most desolate subjects.

Every journey is a detour. It turns out that Jonathan was not terminally ill, but by then it's too late: a remission that is no remission, another wrong movement. The figure of Nic Ray frames the film, but we are left in the air, to await Wenders' next quest and his next false move.

Brooks babbles too often in High Anxiety

High Anxiety is the ultimate Mel Brooks trip. Not only did he write, produce, direct, and star in the film, but he also wrote the words and composed the music for a song that he sings in it. What more could we ask?

If you are a Mel Brooks fan, nothing. Mel plays himself and dominates the screen almost to the exclusion of anyone else. The characteristically shapeless plot allows him to include just about anything he pleases. And we get to hear the man himself croon his own song at a piano bar to the delight of the patrons.

However, if you are not a Mel Brooks fan, you may be left wanting. The film deals with a Psycho-Neurotic Institute for the Very Very Nervous. At the beginning, there have been some mysterious deaths. Mel Brooks, as Dr. Thorndyke, a professor of psychiatry who suffers from a fear of heights called high anxiety, comes in as the new director. By the end of the film he has solved the puzzle. And in the middle, we are treated to a series of gags and one-liners that have an uncertain connection with either the beginning or the end. It is like clothes drying on a clothesline: the clothes are the gags flapping in the wind and the line or plot only just manages to prevent them from flying away.

It is billed as homage to Alfred Hitchcock, but one lesson of his was lost in the film. In Hitchcock's best works, you will not find an extraneous scene, an action or a character who is not there to further the plot. The suspense (or in this case, humour) comes from that plot, not the frightened faces and cliché music that is in High Anxiety.

To back him on the screen, Mel Brooks has some very competent help. Unfortunately, they tend to show up his shortcomings as an actor. As he is busy playing Mel Brooks, he is not convincing as a psychiatrist, nor does it seem that he is really involved in the action. A big part of humour is believability. It may, for example, be funny to hear an eminent psychiatrist talk about pee pee envy to a psychiatric convention, but it is not funny to hear a man who knows all the jokes in advance talk about pee pee envy to a bunch of willing accomplices. There are just too many people in the movie who know what to expect.

"Is there a doctor in the house? This poor man has crazy-glued his eye to a camera lens."

The supporting actors are very good and have some very funny scenes of their own. They are good because they are part of the plot and because they are believable. Cloris Leachman as Nurse Diesel (shades of Cuckoo's Nest) and Harvey Korman as her sex and bondage partner have an excellent bit drinking and eating while plotting a murder, all photographed from under a glass table. Madeline Kahn as the romantic interest of the film has a nice scene listening to what she takes to be an obscene phone call while playing with a teddy bear.

So, if you like Mel Brooks in large doses, 'High Anxiety' is the film for you. If you don't, get together with some friends and make up your own jokes.

Julius Schmid would like to give you some straight talk about condoms, rubbers, sheaths, safes, French letters, storkstoppers.

All of the above are other names for prophylactics. One of the oldest and most effective means of birth control known and the most popular form used by males. Apart from birth control, use of the prophylactic is the only method officially recognized and accepted as an aid in the prevention of transmission of venereal disease.

Skin

Prophylactics.

Skin prophylactics made from the membranes of lambs were introduced in England as early as the eighteenth century. Colloquially known as "armour"; used by Cassanova, and mentioned in classic literature by Richard Boswell in his "London Journal" (where we read of his misfortune from not using one), they continue to be used and increase in popularity to this very day.

Because they are made from natural membranes, "skins" are just about the best conductors of body warmth money can buy and therefore their effect on sensation and feeling is almost insignificant.

Rubber Prophylactics

The development of the latex rubber process in the twentieth century made it possible to produce strong rubber prophylactics of exquisite thinness, with an elastic ring at the open end to keep the prophylactic from slipping off the erect penis. Now these latex rubber prophylactics are available in a variety of shapes and colours, either plain-ended, or tipped with a "teat" or "reservoir end" to receive and hold ejaculated semen.

Lubrication

And thanks to modern chemistry, several new non-reactive lubricants have been developed so that prophylactics are available in either non-lubricated or lubricated forms. The lubricated form is generally regarded as providing improved sensitivity, as is, incidentally, the NuForm Sensi-Shape. For your added convenience, all prophylactics are pre-rolled and ready-to-use.

Some Helpful Hints

The effectiveness of a prophylactic, whether for birth control or to help prevent venereal disease, is dependent in large measure upon the way in which it is used and disposed of. Here are a few simple suggestions that you may find helpful.

Packaging

First of all, there's the matter of packaging. Skin prophylactics are how packaged premoistened in sealed aluminum foil pouches to keep them fresh, dependable and ready for use. Latex rubber prophylactics are usually packaged in sealed plasticized paper pouches or aluminum foil.

All of these prophylactics, at least those marketed by reputable firms, are tested electronically and by other methods to make sure they are free of defects. Prophylactics are handled very carefully during the packaging operation to make sure they are not damaged in any way.

Prophylactic Shapes

Plain end

Sensi-Shape

Reservoir end

Sensi-Shape Ribbed

Storage and Handling

It is equally important that you store and handle them carefully after you buy them, if you expect best results and dependability. For example, don't carry them around in your wallet in your back pocket and sit on them from time to time. This can damage them and make them worthless. Next is the matter of opening the package. It's best to tear the paper or foil along one edge so that the simple act of tearing doesn't cause a pinhole. And of course, one should be particularly careful of sharp fingernails whenever handling the prophylactic.

Putting Them On

The condom, or prophylactic, should be put on before there is any contact between the penis and the vaginal area. This is important, as it is possible for small amounts of semen to escape from the penis even before orgasm.

Unroll the prophylactic gently onto the erect penis, leaving about a half of an inch projecting beyond the tip of the penis to receive the male fluid (semen). This is more easily judged with those prophylactics that have a reservoir end. The space left at the end or the reservoir, should be squeezed while unrolling, so that air is not trapped in the closed end.

As mentioned earlier, you may wish to apply a suitable lubricant either to the vaginal entrance or to the outside surface of the prophylactic, or both, to make entry easier and to lessen any risk of the prophylactic tearing.

Taking Them Off

When sexual relations are completed, withdraw the penis while the erection is still present, holding the rim of the prophylactic until withdrawal is complete, so as to stop any escape of semen from the prophylactic as well as to stop it from slipping off. Remove the prophylactic and, as an added precaution, use soap and water to wash the hands, penis and surrounding area and also the vaginal area to help destroy any traces of sperm or germs.

And now for a commercial.

As you've read this far you're probably asking yourself who makes the most popular brands of prophylactics in Canada?

The answer to that is Julius Schmid. And we'd like to take this opportunity to introduce you to six of the best brands of prophylactics that money can buy. They're all made by Julius Schmid. They're all electronically tested to assure dependability and quality. And you can only buy them in drug stores.

Gunslinger misses target in overambitious show

The recent U.C. production of the narrative poem Gunslinger by Edward Dorn, directed by Lorne Buchman, began and ended beautifully, but left me unsatisfied. The silhouetted characters of the poet's design were brought to life with a masterful, magic touch that caught the imagination. But after this, the 'play' became a metaphysical intrigue that did not seem to reach a definite climax. I think the production attempted too much in a short period of time — a commendable though unsuccessful ambition.

A poem works well as a concentrated form of sensual experience because, for one thing, it can be re-read. The theatre, conversely, works best because of its living immediacy. For a narrative poem to work dramatically it needs to build to something besides the grating intrusions of the played-out poet. His words of explanation outweigh his own art, he is a part of it. It is confusing that the narrator, like the poet, is also at work in several forms.

Nick Liapis composed and performed an arresting guitar piece though somewhat similar to Bruce Cockburn's music. Ian Lea as the 'Horse' got people chuckling. There was a competent performance from Brenda Snaith as 'Miss Lil' and the amusing Stephen Stuckey as 'I'.

Something for everyone in N.B.C.'s gala

The National Ballet pulled out all the stops for their gala performance last Wednesday and the danseurs, danseuses etoiles imported for the event gave the Toronto audience a taste of the calibre of dancing enjoyed by international cities nightly.

Suzanne Farrell and Peter Martins from the New York City Ballet gave the solid star performance that has earned them their reputation as the premier dance partnership since Fonteyn and Nureyev. Farrell especially was a joy to watch in spite of her premature finish of the pirouette turns from Balanchine's Tchaikowsky Pas de Deux. Her body evokes the poetic similes that every dance reviewer is prone to: steel swathed in silk, an undulating Grace, lambent limpidness. Her technique is near perfect: the extensions reach to the sky and her co-ordination of feet and shoulders and head is a marvel to see. In the Tchaikowsky Pas de Deux her battements cambres stimulated the kind of applause accorded Martins for his leaps and bounds.

The harmony between the two in the Pas de Deux was so effortless that one hoped that the rising stars of the National were in the wings to learn how this physical duality is attained. The succession of basket turns in the finale was performed as if by one; their touch on one another was light as air.

The mature wisdom of the partnership was, to this member of the audience, slightly unsuited for Jerome Robbins' Afternoon of a Faun; at any rate, they give it an interpretation too far away from the narcissistic innocence and sexual awakening the interlude seems created to convey. The choreography is cinematic — it is ideally performed by a couple truly coming to awareness of another dimension of eros than that of their own image in the mirrored practice room. The choreography should exploit the couple; it needs their young dancers' spirit to create its powerful suggestion.

Martins and Farrell are too knowing, too self-confident, to be breathtakingly effective for the pas de deux. But the piece, when competently performed and with its bonuses of Debussy and the backdrop stolen from the imagination, is always a pleasure to watch. Its sensuality can be enjoyed from another angle — that of two people who are familiar with the pleasures of the bed.

The other showstopper on the program was the Don Quixote pas de deux. This is the kind of piece we criticize the Bolshoi for dragging out of the mothballs for their increasingly infrequent North American tours. But it sets the heart and hands pounding and that's what we were out there for. Peter Schaufuss' theatricality was a good match for Elisabetta Terabust's Latin temperament and flashing eyes. This ballerina, who was a last minute replacement for American Ballet Theatre's Gelsey Kirkland (who couldn't be spared from the star roster of her own company), performed her four arabesque balances beautifully and the last one, as a dividend, was sustained beyond belief. Her pirouette turns in place were crisply done and Schaufuss brought down the house with his grand jetes en tournant.

The gala was opened, as if by way of vindication of National Ballet criticism of the weakness of its male dancers and its eternally classical repertory, by Hans van Manen's Four Schumann Pieces with Frank Augustyn in the lead. Augustyn filled Nureyev's shoes well (who performed it for the National Ballet debut of the piece) and added a little of his own style to a choreography that is termed "music visualized." The pas de deux between the two men, a Dutch National Ballet trademark, was airborne and graceful and constitutes a new success for the company.

What should have been the highlight of the program, and disappointingly wasn't, was Frederick Ashton's The Dream, a ballet choreographed after Shakespeare's A Midsummer's Night Dream. Ashton's genius for dance wasn't very well served by the National. One thinks of his Jazz Calendar and appreciates his sense of fluidity and imagination. Or of La Fille Mal Gardee for his earthy sense of humor and his sure eye for successful stage business. In The Dream, we find all these elements but some of the dancers weren't up to translating them to the audience. The faeries particularly seemed too heavyhooved to be veritable woodland sprites and had difficulty keeping step with Mendelssohn's quick violins. The mismatched couples did their broad burlesque bits well enough and the two main character roles, those of Puck and Bottom, were ably managed, especially David Roxander as Puck.

Kain as Titania was paired with Luc Arnot in the role of Oberon, whose masculine stature served him well as King, but whose partnering of his queen was rough and unsure in spots. Their final pas de deux was very pretty, but one was never sure in which vein to appreciate this ballet. The blend of romance, comedy, character dancing and stage effects doesn't have the same homogeneity as in La Fille; on top of that, we couldn't appreciate the unique appeal of Kain for she was disguised in a ridiculous blonde wig and wore the same ghastly shade of spangled green as her dryad pals. Moreover, the audience, having exhausted themselves applauding the earlier stars, were too befuddled to give this ballet the full attention it needed. Ashton mocking the genre is a very subtle thing.

Cultured seeds give birth to weeds

Every so often something appears from that cultural wasteland known as Trinity College that has redeeming value and intrinsic worth. One event that stands out is Cultured Seeds, a comedy with a serious side, presented at Cartwright Hall before Reading Week. It is the second effort of John Agnew and Douglass Beattie and is superior to the first, Mrs. Edgcombe's Return.

The plot is complicated. A family is experiencing marital difficulties which are aggravated by a sponging counter-culture therapist. On New Year's Eve the marriage founders with the husband leaving wife, twin daughters and boyfriends, younger daughter and a smaller cousin desolate. The therapist becomes a resident, to the great disgust and consternation of everyone but the wife.

The two younger girls (Vanessa and Kim) have been involved in a production of a Midsummer Night's Dream at their school and, inspired by the play, pour flower-juice into Mrs. Livingston's eyes the night before the breakup. Alas she wakes to see not her husband but her therapist. Realizing what has happened the two try to rectify the situation, with the help of their older twin sisters who are too far gone into the adult world to help. Eventually the parents are reunited, the mooch is out on his ear and everyone is happy.

Comparisons can easily be made between Cultured Seeds and la piece bien faite of the previous century as both are comedies of character and manners and are intended to deal with contemporary social issues.

In standard farce the audience is to remain unaware that they themselves were being portrayed on stage. This is not the case with Cultured Seeds though, as the insertion of Midsummer Night's Dream brings in the idea of a play within a play within a play quite forcibly. It should not be possible for us to remain in our dream.

The performance was not up to the script. The lighting was on a much larger scale than other productions in this hall and was better for it, the set sturdy and well-designed. In general the cast was too stiff and wooden; hands may as well have been cut off at the wrists, embraces appeared as casual hugs.

As Cultured Seeds is basically a play of manners, i.e. social games, the identical twin daughters, being young, attractive and easily confused, shaped the play to a large extent. The identical twins playing Alexandra and Constance, Janet and Nancy Lang, gave good performances when they were dealing with the hazards of being advocates of Twin Power.

The two respective boyfriends, George and Matt, were secondary characters and were not allowed that much freedom to develop. The therapist (Blake Woodsides), who took an interest in the twins as well as the wife, had the privilege of making the greatest number of identity mistakes. He had a relatively simple job to do — be thoroughly obnoxious and take all the flak at the end.

The two younger girls, Vanessa Livingston and cousin Kim were as important to the show as the twins and were played very strongly by Chris Hausler and Elaine Wright. Hausler was energetic, exuberant and committed throughout. Wright, her sidekick in misadventure, kept things always active as well despite her youth.

Youth often works against an adequate portrayal of an older character and this happened with Les Marton and Cyndy Martin. The separation and making-up scenes could have had a better feeling of the emotional extremes involved but the director may have wished to avoid such extremes.

Like many other things at Trinity, the more one knows the people involved the greater the appreciation. This is certainly the case with Cultured Seeds. Agnew and Beattie are to be praised and encouraged to further efforts but they should perhaps consider lessening the similarities between real and stage characters and having a more detached finished product.

Jim Sheppard

This important solo was choreographed by Nureyev with himself in mind so only time will tell whether Schaufuss, who is not so long in the leg, can fully master its intricacies, but to be fair, he learned the role in a great flurry.

Nonetheless, Schaufuss earned quite a few points in the third act, particularly when he stopped manifesting the labored mime expressions that went out of vogue with silent films. The lovesick puppy was suddenly transformed into a dazzling prince but it remains clear that Schaufuss needs to refine his dramatic efforts which, heavy-handed as they were didn't do his classically handsome features and superb styling any justice.

Harwood, who had been dancing Princess Aurora with graceful skill, gained fresh vitality when her partner relaxed. The two generated a great deal of excitement in the same act with three highly supple fish dives. Schaufuss, on his own, brought it to a peak by encircling the stage with 23 lofty grand jets that he dazzlingly closed with five quick spins.

Additional efforts which helped to raise The Sleeping Beauty above its heavy decor were given, on opening night, by David Roxander as the buoyant tomat and by James Kudelka as a sprightly Diamond. The following evening Yoland Auger developed into a poignantly saucy pussycat.

Scots played out of kilter

"The St. Andrew's Players" who presented Blade, a play by Jock Stroyan that played at Studio Theatre on Tuesday, should have spared themselves the long journey that brought them to us from Scotland. (The St. Andrew's Players originate from St. Andrew's University).

The director and playwright, Jock Stroyan, played one of the one-act play's four characters. That character, named Tom, has hyperactive imagination that moves him to act out his fantasies. One of those fantasies, which recurs in the play, has him cross-dressing as a woman.

There is a more normal but constantly irate character named Carrie, played by Anne Wessels, who is supposedly especially concerned with helping the mentally ill. Alan Dickey plays a slightly too articulate but fairly effective former inmate of a mental institution. He mastered the facial expressions of a man who might have been the victim of electro-shock therapy.

Just to make it a foursome, there was Lena, played by Joanna Payton, who was an elderly blind woman.

It is difficult to decipher what the playwright was up to in this play. The trouble was less with the staging and more with the ponderous dialogue that assumed the audience was unacquainted with the abnormal.

The play suffered from an undefined plot. Frankly, it was impossible at times to figure out what was going on. A clearer definition of the relationship of one character to another would have helped make some sense out of confusion. Tom was Carrie's boyfriend, Mick was Carrie's madman, and Lena might be described as Tom's "blind" date. Not that Tom had not seen Lena before, but, certainly, Lena had never seen Tom before. It cannot be said with certainty why these characters were thrown together.

One quickly tired of the cliché symbolism threaded through the characters' lines. There were plenty of references to water and grass. Stroyan's "blade" of grass was his symbol for life. For effectiveness, he would have done better to recite some Walt Whitman.

But the references to water finally brought to mind a proper description of the play. It was like the steady, annoying drip from a leaky tap.

With the exception of Alan Dickey, the cast was trying too hard to be convincing. Dickey would have made Mick believable but for the lines he had to put in the mad-man's mouth.

The best example of how this play affected its audience came at its end. The lights went down on stage, and the audience sat in embarrassed silence. They were unsure about whether the play had ended and the time for applause came.

Ken Whitehurst

New art form: live cinema

The Flicks!

Dinner and show: an ominous combination, when theatre so-called is palatable only after a meal of soporific proportions. Instead, I had a meat-ball sandwich, a beer, and began composing my damning notice for the Friday paper. "To be successful, a production based in a bar must be apparently witty, insouciant, and populated with elegant and charming people. And generally such a production is poorly done, with only a veneer of control, and is really a morality tale disguised as entertainment. The performers are charlatans of the emotions; the whole production a display of contempt, reaching for wallets rather than hearts or feelings..."

But then the lights went down, and

'Hooray for Hollywood' started: and I was unexpectedly convulsed with laughter. Indeed, skit went to skit and they called for louder music, sweeter wine: called, in fact, for several more beers to aid the digestion. The movies had an immense impact on our store of emotional cliché situations, and the writer of this show, James Saar, has a keen eye for those which we recognize. The mythology of the silver screen is fair game for him, and only a few of his references are straight-faced. In an hour and a half he has directed his highly personable cast of four through the scenery and characters of each decade of motion pictures, sparing neither the good nor the atrocious films that were made over the years.

Whom would you prefer? You can have Chaplin, Bogart, Bacall, Gable, Dietrich and Minelli. Or Annette Funicello, Groucho Marx and Margaret Dumont, R2D2 (in absentia), Porky Pig, Bing Crosby and Marlon Brando. And, for good measure, a variety of production styles and screening situations from Busby Berkeley to dubbed foreign films.

If you enjoy watching every movie that appears on the tube after three in the morning, even if it's a Spanish-made French-dubbed film shown on the Bosnian program, take in The Flicks. At $5.50 it's a risk; but superior material, four good singing voices and especially the excellent choreography make it worthwhile. I'll be going again to capture what I missed the first time.

TRANSITIONAL YEAR PROGRAMME

UNIVERSITY

Applications for admissions to the 1978-79 academic session are now available.

The Programme is a one-year, full-time pre-admission course of studies for prospective students who were not able to complete high school to qualify for University admission due to social and/or financial reasons. Students in the programme are generally at least 19 years old and have been in the work force. Admissions will be based on motivation, needs and abilities. Canadian Music Ensemble in the moog

Last Thursday at the Theatre Downstairs, the Canadian Electronic Ensemble performed two new works that were standouts. One was Charles by David Grimes and the other was A Wave and A Bird by David Jaeger.

Charles features unusual electronic water music effects at its opening and closing. Within the piece, jazz sections on brass instruments avoided the cliché of the usually expected brass solo, and blended smoothly with striking ostinato passages. In addition, Peter Magadini on the drums worked well into the electronic beat adding a gutsy rhythmic texture. Overall the composer used his resources to produce a piece that was aesthetically successful.

A Wave and A Bird was also a polished and musically effective work that showed off the talents, almost telepathic togetherness and command of the Canadian Electronic Ensemble, as well as the skills of drummer Magadini who distinguished himself in a solo.

The other pieces on the program were less successful. Sotto Voce by David Grimes was saved by the eerie atmosphere of the work, enhanced by the lighting and staging and by the fine voice of Mary-Jo Maur. Much of the music was a shade stagey, some of the background sounds were offensively loud, and the playback vocal texture effects were hackneyed.

Mano a Mano by the Ensemble was the least successful work, and unfortunately the only one filmed by the CBC for an upcoming "Man and His Music" episode. The work came to life at the climax with a passage that had considerable power without harshness. Otherwise, it seemed without organization or direction and its lackadaisical use of channel pausing, its very basic pulse and a lot of filtered sounds, were boring. The audience was occasionally awakened by some unremitting hornlike noise that sounded like a moose in trouble, and with a lot of sounds that were poorly controlled and just too loud in the small theatre.

Greenwood Station by Bob Bauer had problems. The idea seemed to be to make this subway ride a cosmic experience that ended with the train taking us to some misty far away place. There was a recording of a train, the pulling and braking of it, the sound of footsteps, all treated musique concrete style, with the use of pulse and glissandi over an ambient sound which included electronic buzzing. The signal-to-noise ratio was not good because of the use of cassette tape. Most of the sounds were really not too sophisticated and had effects that might be of interest to a novice but tend to sound war-horsey to the experienced listener.

All performances suffered from the unimaginative placement of the speakers at the front.

Resident talent Sunday afternoon

When a number of fine solo musicians get together, the result can't help but be of top calibre, and such is certainly the case in the Fenyes-Orloff Par Trio, as witnessed by the recent concert of the Sunday Scholarship Series at Walter Hall. These important members of the Faculty of Music were well assisted by Roxolana Roslak and Uri Mayer in a performance that was both exciting and sensitive.

Chamber music requires a unique blend of soloistic awareness and ensemble rapport for the achievement of originality and integrity. That this was mastered, was immediately evident in the Trio's performance of the Beethoven Op. 1 No. 1. The delicate shading of Parr's piano opening to the second movement was beautifully continued by the warm tones of the strings, while the sparkling phrasing and lively pace of the Finale certainly justified a smile.

In Schumann's Op. 47 Piano Quartet, the perpetuum mobile Scherzo was performed with amazing timing and clarity of musical contour considering the break-neck tempo.

If this movement illustrated the technical virtuosity of the players, the next revealed their musicality, with a flowing cantabile melody adroitly passed from one instrument to another. Cellist Orloff's final presentation of the theme was especially memorable.

The Canadian premiere of the Romanzen-Suite for soprano and piano trio by Shostakovich marked the high point of the concert. A strong and penetrating singing by Roslak was matched by the sensitive accompaniment of the Trio, whose various solo and duet combinations well emphasized the dramatic contrasts of the seven songs. The virtuoso frenzy of a storm portrayed by Fenyes and Parr in the fifth song subsided almost miraculously into the contemplative cello soliloquy introducing the penultimate song. Only in the final piece did all forces join together, for a poignant and serene ending to this highly dramatic work.

Anouilh hangs moon & Les loves it

Ryerson's theatre department was active last week, unlike you and me, resulting in a production of Anouilh's Ring Round the Moon.

This is another of those plays involving twins, although one actor plays both. At first, the audience is treated to a witty comedy of manners, with a lightness of style that is highly artificial and amusing, but without any hint of reality underneath.

But Anouilh was out to make a point, and brings the artifice crashing down to the ground by allowing an interloper into this world of style, a poor girl who takes things seriously, and whose seriousness must be accepted by the audience for the play to work. She brings the world of the rich twins into question, as well as the very delightful but empty artifice of the play itself.

Ultimately, there is a happy ending, but happy only as far as expectations go: although boy gets girl in stereo, and the rich tycoon is not ruined after all, the resolution is ominously arbitrary. As the aunt of the twins says, "everything has to end happily". If that's the only reason for it, that is, because of convention, then how happy can it really be?

Peter Van Wart was a convincing pair with the help of a stand-in to lurk at the edges of the stage while Peter ran around to become his own double. His approach fitted the style, even if he did tend to pose excessively, waiting for his next line. Lorie Charters, as the poor girl Isabelle, made the show work: facing the greatest challenge, Isabelle the poor dancer was transformed into rhetorical Isabelle, mouthpiece for Anouilh, without any loss of credibility. Moreover, she made the twins insipid or boorish (respectively) beside her.

The other key performance was that of Bruce McFee, as a financier who takes the bourgeois exit from the bourgeois role (he gets rid of all his money: in the happy ending, he gets it all back, but pretends to be poor anyway). I feared an anti-semitic caricature at the first sound of his voice, but was treated to a character of some warmth.

The technical corps at Ryerson must be mentioned, not so much because it was especially praiseworthy, as because there is a department there turning out costumes and sets that are first rate.

Their next show will be that classic of the musical comedy genre, Canterbury Tales.

Celtic Hero great Yeats

The Celtic Hero, Four Cuchulain Plays by W.B. Yeats, presented by Celtic Arts, is playing at the Bayview Playhouse Theatre until Saturday. It is a production definitely worth seeing, if not for Yeats "in action", then at least for the outstanding sets and costumes.

The Celtic Hero is a set of plays dramatizing the life and death of a mythical tragic hero. Lured away from the Hawk's well holding the water of eternal life, Cuchulain proceeds to gain the admiration and support of the Irish people. In an ensuing battle, he is mortally wounded and sets out to die, defenceless, tied to a post by the mother of his son.

David Fox plays the hero with admirable strength and passion. As the young Cuchulain he is cocky, self-assured and not at all a likeable fellow. As the play progresses, Fox becomes a very powerful and emotional personality. Charmion King, as Cuchulain's wife, plays her role with cruel dignity and effectively portrays her antagonism towards her husband's mistress. Maureen McRae is the young lover and, contrasted with Ms. King's strong character, is adequately weak and gullible.

David Stratton, who plays the Fool in the second play, appears as a highly amusing and entertaining performer whose lively antics provide us with a welcome relief from the tension in the previous scene. Jeff Braunstein's Blind Man was consistently stern and gloomy and with Stratton, helped to provide us with one of the better scenes in the play. However, I didn't understand Braunstein's desire for sunglasses.

The Celtic Hero is filled with symbolism and imagery, shifting from dream to reality. The sets and costumes echo these mixtures in the play. The sets are simple, sparse, and functional. They present an effective and stunning contrast with the colourful and elaborate costumes. The dancers, Wakano Ito, Jennifer Mascall, and Nancy Scheiber, provide colour and free-flowing movement to an otherwise slow-moving play.

Friday: The good news, sorta, is that contrary to my fears and suspicions Cinema Lumiere has not gone the way of all things in this vale of tears. They're still less than prompt about getting their schedules together and their last flier arrived here on suspiciously inexpensive paper. Therefore if you're feeling either tough or charitable, or golden-hearted beneath that stony exterior, you could catch their Bogart festival this weekend. They have Bette Davis when she wasn't chopping up your sweetie with a dull axe in The Petrified Forest and Peter Lorre before he learned to pas de deux (sic) with Vincent Price in The Maltese Falcon. News that's not so good is that the New Yorker is confirmed in its policy of bringing unshown but bad films to this mediocrity-starved city and showing them forever. At the moment they have Mohammed, Messenger of God. Also the U of T Film Society (see Dan! Look and see!) has Dawg Day Afternoon (a canine adaptation of DeBussy's famous tone-poem). Over at the Revue, which plods on towards an almost aetherial decay with The Stranger and Death in Venice.

Saturday: There is a remarkable constancy in things. All may flow but it seems to stop over for weekends in Toronto.

Sunday: More melodrama at the AGO with Autumn Leaves and Bigger Than Life (the latter a stunning study of conurbation in the mid-American Necropolis). Innis has Jazz and Boogie cartoons (bring your dark glasses) and Birth of a Nation in the evening.

Monday: Lumiere has an intriguing bit of imaginative syntheses with Cul de Sac and The Honeymoon Killers. Otherwise...

Tuesday: The Science Centre has the seminal experience in Weimar fun and frolic The Blue Angel.

Wednesday: OISE probably has the best show in town but I don't know what it is (right Elaine?). The Revue has Truffaut with The Bride Wore Black (a must for all Jeanne Moreau droolers) and Jules and Jim (in which she's not nearly so interesting).

Thursday: I don't really know or care and I bet you don't much either. No one's bothering to show Ice which is about all I'm in the mood to see right now. A good dose of naive politics and heavy-handed symbolism would set those pitter-patters in motion. And where's Metal Messiah? Are you listening out there folks? It's about time we had some decently execrable flix in this town.

If you can drag yourselves away from essays and seminar presentations. (I know it isn't easy), there's The National Ballet of Canada's spring season still running almost at the foot of Yonge Street in the O'Keefe Centre. Tonight at 8 p.m. Vanessa Harwood and Peter Schaufuss take the principal roles in Erik Bruhn's haunting version of Swan Lake. Tomorrow at 2 p.m. the same features Nadia Potts and Thomas Schramek while the evening performance stars Karen Kain and Frank Augustyn. On Sunday night Harwood and Schaufuss return with the added bonus, former artistic director Celia Franca.

Next Wednesday evening is special:

Veronica Tennant returns to the stage opposite Peter Schaufuss in Frederick Ashton's The Dream. Alongside The Dream is John Neumeier's Don Juan. Augustyn, Kain, Harwood and Mary Jago are all dancing that night as well. March 2 at 8 p.m. The Dream and Don Juan are repeated with a different cast that includes Harwood and Schramek.

For those of you who didn't go to the Gala Performance Feb. 15, there's a review of The Dream by Heather Hill this week. Tickets for the ballet range from $4.50 to $17.50 and expect to fork over about $12.50 for a good seat (slightly cheaper for a matinee). Check the dailies for a complete listing or call the O'Keefe Box Office: 363-6633.

Also tonight, something which sounds highly intriguing (or pure bull shit, depending on your perspective) at 15 Dance Lab. Choreographer Louise Garfield will climb in and out of 9 ft. vinyl bubble, attach people to a 5 ft. ball and dance with a 14 ft. balloon — all to see whether or not man is still the measure of all things. Tomorrow night as well. 8:30 p.m. 155a George Street. $3. Info: 869-1589.

The TTC's version of the Rolling Thunder Review arrived yesterday on the walls of TTC Car No. 5780. Witness Rolling Landscape. To replace those alluring ads for chocolates and pantyhose are 50 transparent colour photographs — geared towards the aesthetic rather than the appetitive. Catch the Yonge-University-Spadina train till March 8, and the Bloor train from March 9 till March 22. You may have to wait a while, so carry along your Portable Joyce or The Quark and How To Do It. Oh, and while you're at it, check out the Spadina stations — chilly but chic.

For that special dinner party you may feel your living room ain't got enough class, in which case the Art Gallery of Ontario can rent you a painting. Opening next Friday, till April 3 is an exhibition of some rentable works.

The good news is that the Lawren Harris exhibition is still on at the AG — till Sunday. It's now or never and I'd recommend it as a final breath of fresh air before the power-polluted months to come. Also at the AGO are a Canadian Inuit Printmaking Retrospective and a Profile of Canadian Indian Art called Bo'Jon, Nejee! Both till April 2, as is the Master Prints — Recent Acquisitions exhibition in the Trier Gallery at the AGO.

Ron Baker's Colour Paintings close today at Hart House. Anna Myers and Lena Endicott are up next. On campus, St. Mike's Visual Arts Week will be in full swing starting Monday, with works from the campus-wide art competition, selected pieces from St. Michael's College Collection, and a sculpture exhibition by top Canadian sculptors. Seminars, workshops, and tours throughout the week. Attend and see how St. Mike's can work for you.

Top shows this week are the Miro Engravings at the Albert White Gallery till March 1, watercolours by Mashe Tettebaum at the Gallery Moos till March 16, and Acrylic Paintings on Paper by Pudlo of Cape Dorset at the Innuitt Gallery of Eskimo Art. You will also like the Japanese Prints at the Atelier Fine Arts, a collection of mid-19th century works.

The Aggregation Gallery has collages and paintings by Rose Lindzon; Sable-Castell Gallery has paintings by Alex Cameron, the Merton Gallery has an excellent show by Jerry McGrath of his Kittle Scapes, and the lower level of 696 Bloor West has a puzzling endeavour by John Massey called The 2 Rooms (a set of circumstance).

Topical Greg Curnoe has entitled his present exhibition at the Isaacs Gallery, A Proposed Referendum Question and Five Series. It may take till March 10 to find out what he's asking but you can't quarrel with his colours.

Toronto Sensibility (sounds like an ad for Toronto Life) is an exhibition of paintings by 13 of Toronto's established artists including my favourite — Gershon Iskowitz, and some new guys like Harold Klunder. For a run through of who you should know on the Toronto art scene, see it. Till March 19, at Harbourfront. ...in which the Toronto Art scene was caught flitting with the idea of sexual reproductions. Allegedly framed however, by big business.

Hello Jazz Fans! Catch vibraphonist Milt 'Bags' Jackson at Bourbon St. this weekend. After a long stint as the premier member of the Modern Jazz Quartet, Milt has been on his own since the group broke up in 1974. A masterful improviser, he never hides his roots in the blues. Incidentally, Milt is a jazz racist who believes that only black people can truly play jazz. On Monday, Bob Wilbur brings in his sax and clarinet.

At George's, the Ian McDougall Quartet ('bone) finishes off the week, making way on Feb. 27 for flautist Mo Koffman and his quintet. Ask for Giant Steps.

The Joey Goldstein Quartet will perform after hours tonight and tomorrow at Cafe Soho, 334 Queen W. On Sunday afternoon at 2:30 the Tim Cummins Band play their improvisations. Easy atmosphere, cheap cover charge.

On Tuesday, Feb. 28 at 8:30 p.m., York University presents the World Saxophone Quartet, featuring David Murray, Julius Hemphill, Oliver Lake and Hamiet Bluiett. Tickets are $5.50, students $3.50. Burton Auditorium, 667-2370.

Well-known drummer Jack DeJohnette comes into the Colonial Tavern with his band Direction on Wed. March 1 - Sat. March 4. Cover $3.

The Hart House Wednesday noon-hour concerts continue to bring in the best jazz artists. This past week witnessed inspired solos by Andy Krehm and Harvey Kogen; the latter especially is a man to watch. Next week features the Dave McMurdo Quartet. Dave plays trombone in the Boss Brass or in Nimmons's Nine plus Six - 1 forget).

Dixieland: The free Eaton's Centre concert tonight presents Jim McHarg's Midnight Special at 5 p.m. At Harbourfront on Sunday, the Climax Jazz Band. Check the Globe and Mail for updates.

As a concluding note, I would like to reiterate with the jazz fans whose disturbing behaviour has given rise to the following libelous comments which appeared in the recent Star Sunday Magazine article on the El Mocambo: "The worst tipplers are jazz fanatics: uptight, deeply into their music, possessed of wallets that open only once, to pay for the single drink they nurse all night."

So here we are, back from a week-long sojourn, facing a line-up of musical masterminds the length of your arm. And who more appropriate to start the fun than the "crown prince of the flugelhorn" himself, Chuck Mangione? Good clean fun for the whole family and Chucko always introduces his family (that's the only reason I go to his shows). Massey Hall, Mar. 2nd.

Next in the line-up of mega-stars is Journey at Massey Hall on the 14th. At least one really bad musician from every mindless heavy metal ensemble that has recently bit the dust has found his way into this group. To be avoided. On the 9th of next month, Blue Oyster Cult flops into the Gardens to prove that every band really does need fifteen guitarists in its line-up. It gives it a full sound, ya know? Then there's Jumpin' Jimmy Buffet at the Gardens on the 17th. Triumph (believe it or not) at the same location on the 21st and the mindless eclectic fury of the groinkicking Chieftains at Massey on the 11th.

Moving from the ridiculous to the ridiculous, we find Harbinger at the Tube tonight. The Dixie Flyers are at the Horseshoe, Harlequin is at the Chimney, Goddo is at the Gasworks and Stringband is at the Groaning Board. The real fun is to be found at the El Mocambo, however, in the form of the Average White Band. Disco-get-down-boogie-till-you-die. And, at the Colonial tonight, Crowbar, the Canadian ensemble that we all hoped had died gracefully never to be seen again, has been resurrected. Could be worth a giggle.

And now for the campus hi-jinks. Believe it or not, the kids at Trinity are putting safety pins in their painter pants tonight and having a punk fest in the Buttery starting at 7:30. Featured will be several groups of Trinity types 'clowning it up' plus headlines Berlin. At Dr. John's this evening it's the Ian Tamblin Band. Alreet.

A rather uncrowded week. Tonight at the St. Lawrence Quartet Canada (Staryk, Turini, Stanick and Tsutsumi) play three piano quartets — Beethoven's Op. 16, Schumann's Op. 47, and a work by Prof. Kennins of the Music Faculty Tonight and tomorrow in Walter Hall, the Chamber Players of Toronto offer a program of concertos (Handel, Bach, Scarlatti, etc.). 8:30.

The Hart House Beethoven Series continues Sunday at three. Otto Armin, violin, Elyakim Tausig, piano and Tsuyoshi Tsutsumi (of Quartet Canada), cello. Free tickets from the Porter.

Massey Hall this week features the popular cellist Lynn Harrel (a he, not a she) and the consistently exciting conductor Klaus Tennstedt. Program is a bit of a stinker — Shostakovich's First and Tchaikovsky's Variations on a Roccoco Theme. Tuesday and Wednesday at 8:30, rush at 7:00.

The free Thursday afternoon series features a lecture by violinist Victor Martin and a film, both on Jascha Heifetz. 2:10 in Walter Hall, no tickets required. The Thursday evening performance by the Alban Berg Quartet is certainly one of the most important premieres of the season. Program includes two of their specialties: Berg and Mozart. $5.50 and $6.50 at the St. Lawrence Centre.

Phoenix, 390 Dupont St., call 922-7835, shows Tuesdays to Fridays at 8:00, Saturdays at 6:00 and 9:30, Sundays at 3:00. Call 366-7723. The O'Keefe Centre is playing at the Immigration Department on University Avenue. At the Royal Alex, The Wlz is still zooming along.

At the Poor Alex, John Herbert's satirical review, The Wonderful Whores, continues. Call 225-6849 for prices and times. Tarragon, 30 Bridgman Avenue, is triumphantly packing in full houses for Michel Tremblay's St. Carmen of the Main. Last two nights, call 531-1827. Incidentally, Tremblay will be on campus early next week at New College, as will La Duchesse de Langeais. Call 978-2461.

As well as Tarragon, the Young People's Theatre must be laughing all the way to the bank. Their production of The Diary of Anne Frank is apparently sold out — completely. We did get review tickets and will tell you all about it next week. If you're an optimist, call them at 864-9732 and see if there are returns.

Closing this week: The Splits, at Toronto Free Theatre, 26 Berkeley St. (368-2856) until Sunday at 8:00, Sunday matinee at 2:00. Also, The Moss Hart comedy Light Up the Sky, at the Firehall tonight and tomorrow at 8:30; 70 Berkeley St., call 364-4170.

Cabaret rides high: Hampton Court opens Tonight at 8:30 . . . 9 o'clock in Newfoundland, a scattergun approach to satire. Shows from Tuesday to Friday at 8:30, Saturday at 8:00 and 10:30, and, believe it or not, a Sunday matinee at 2:00. Call 924-6635. At Old Angelo's, 45 Elm at Bay, Flicks, call 597-0155, 9:00 start. Teller's Cage, Hold Met, call 862-1434 for details. At Schubert's, Marlene, Marlene, call 961-2460.

And still more theatre opens: TWP, having an excellent season, present an Athol Fugard play, The Island, which previews tomorrow and opens Tuesday. $3 for students, curtain at 8:30. 12 Alexander St. or call 925-8640. Fugard, too, will be in Toronto over the weekend. Also previewing Saturday and opening next week will be Peter Weiss' drama of the Nuremberg trials, The Investigation. Previews $1.99 (until the 28th), student price $3.50. At the Factory Theatre, 207 Adelaide E., call 864-9971. At the Tarragon, opening the first, They Club Seals, Don't They?, from the Mommers' Troupe. Only ten performances, 1 to 6 at 8:30, with matinees the Thursday, Friday and Sunday at 2:30. Call 531-1827. The same night Dracula opens at Toronto Free Theatre. Call the box office at 368-2856 for further details. And that's about that for this rather hectic week.

Lady Volleyballers Fail To Reach Final

By SANDY GRANT

On February 9th the Women's volleyball team competed in the pre-finals at Brock to decide which teams would move from Tier One to Tier Two and who would go on to the finals in Western. Toronto ended fourth out of six teams, placing them first in Tier Two but out of contention for the finals.

U of T started the competition by taking on Windsor and losing to them three games straight. However, their next match was against Brock who went down to defeat before the Blues, losing three of four games. In their final game Toronto came up against a strong McMaster team who conceded only one game to the Blues out of four matches. Though they lost the match the Blues always came close with high scores and as the standings were calculated on total points accumulated, the Blues ended up in third place behind York and Guelph and ahead of Mac.

Coach Julie Andruchiw felt the team played well under pressure and pointed out how the team rallied to come back when down in games. She also mentioned how the team held their opponents to two and three points while trying to make up their defeats.

On Saturday, Toronto's first match was against Guelph. The Blues started with great control over the game, which proved to be the most exciting of the week-end, as they fought hard and defeated the Gryphons 16-14. The Blues failed to keep up their strong attack, however, and lost the next three games. This loss meant that the Blues went into the consolation finals with Mac while Guelph and York met in the finals.

Lacking the aggressive play they had demonstrated earlier, Toronto lost to the strong Mac squad. Guelph scored an upset by defeating the previously unbeaten York team and will go on to the finals.

Next year's team will miss Louise Scott, Mary Rafferty, Carol Cumby and Jane Evernden. Returning players will be Marianne Ekberg, Cathy Pogor, Sandy Remigis, Ellen Storey, Kristi Varangu, Jan Anderson, Diane Boonstra and Julia Charles. Coach Andruchiw has plans for attending some outside tournaments early next season for experience and will be looking for new recruits.

Skaters Edged Out By Sharp Western Squad

By KATHERINE SPENCER

On February 17th and 18th the U of T Figure Skating team came second in the OWIAA Championship at Western. Toronto and Western were still tied after 12 of the 16 events. Final scores were, Western 131, Toronto 125 and Queen's, Mac and York each accumulating less than 100 points.

Toronto scored a victory in the precision line numbers that were presented by all the teams for the first time before a judging panel. Skating a complex routine to Beethoven's Fifth Toronto easily sewed up first place.

Other gold medals were won by Judi Henderson and Rosalie Matthews in the Novice Similar Dance; Jane Barber in Novice Ladies; Helen Pribyl in Junior Ladies and Louise Gilchrist in Junior Interpretative.

Elizabeth Gaffney performed in four events for Toronto, all on Friday afternoon and managed to take three seconds and one third.

In the Novice mixed dance, Karen Seldon and Larry Tso combined to take second place. Other second place finishers were turned in by Gaffney and Bill Hanke in the Junior mixed dance, Katherine Spencer and Gaffney in the Junior similar dance and Gaffney in the Intermediate Ladies Dance.

Race For First Not Over Yet

As the interfac schedule winds into its concluding weeks the fight for the top spots in the various divisions is reaching the critical point.

In hockey's Division One A, Victoria (I) and St. Mike's (A) are presently tied for first place but are feeling pressure from both Erindale and Phys Ed.

Play this coming week could very well decide the top spot. Victoria has two games — against Erindale and Phys Ed. Both these teams are presently four points back and will need wins to stay in the race. A Vic sweep of these matches will almost assuredly drop both these teams from the race.

Vic cannot afford to lose because St. Mike's has an easy week with only one game against the last place Scarborough club.

In Division One B it's pretty much the same story as Dents (A), Meds (A) and Trinity (A) are all tied for the top spot.

John McManus: A Coach For All Seasons

By ANDREW MAHON

College coaches aren't noted for their longevity. That's why it's surprising to find a coach like U of T's John McManus.

McManus came to the U of T in 1947, went on to coach intermediate football and basketball teams and became basketball coach of the Varsity Blues, a position he has held for 27 years.

McManus was also assistant coach of the football team until two years ago when the schedules overlapped so much that it wasn't possible to do both.

Over the years, McManus has coached a lot of students and worked with Roy McMurtry and Alan Eagleson.

"That was an adventure" recalls McManus, "Eagleson really knew how to handle a dollar."

Although McManus has coached some championship teams, he hesitates to pick the best.

"The 1958 team won a championship, and that's probably as much talent as I've ever had," says McManus, "But it's all relative — the league has improved considerably since then."

"The teams nowadays are better," contends McManus, "They know better fundamentals and the calibre of high school training is better. When the calibre of high school training improves — we get better players."

McManus recalls some of his earlier teams which had more professional students than today's teams. There were five doctors on the 1956-7 team, and there were three dentists on another.

"We don't get many professional students nowadays because of the time constraints involved with the professional faculties. Most of our players are phys-ed majors or BA's."

Another big change for McManus has been the dwindling crowd support for Varsity teams.

"We used to draw great crowds, but nowadays nobody but the next-of-kin comes to the games."

The Varsity Blues played their home games at Hart House until 7 years ago — a fact that provided McManus with an unusual game strategy.

"Visiting teams hated that place," says McManus. "It was 22 feet short and 10 feet narrower than a regulation court. It was just a shoot and rebound place and we played well there — but we got bombed on the road."

The Blues now practice and play at Benson Building which has one of the best surfaces in the league.

One factor which has not changed dramatically for McManus, is his attitude to coaching.

"I try to think of basketball as being fun. I think about winning as much as possible, but I don't go off the deep end if we play well and lose."

McManus feels that his year's team should have done better than they did. If the Blues had won their Carleton game, they would have secured a playoff spot. Instead they lost and now stand a slim chance of making the playoffs.

"The kids were disappointed, and so was I," said McManus. "We watched them against York so we knew what they were going to do — we just didn't play well."

This year's team will graduate veterans Tim McGhie and Doug Fox who have been consistent players for five seasons, but rookies Bill Pangos and John Lam will be back for the 78-79 season.

"I measure success by this," explains McManus. "If we get 10 to 12 kids at the beginning of the season and they improve during the season, then I think we've been successful."

"Of course, it's all about winning, that's why you play," he says, "but if you don't win, it's not the end of the world."

McManus is a picture of patience as he instructs his troops.

Rocci Pagnello, Rob Gemmell: Hockey Blues' Dynamic Duo

By HOWARD DEANE

Rocci Pagnello and Rob Gemmell have combined this season to produce the Blues' most effective defensive duo in recent years.

Gemmell is currently the highest scoring defenceman in the OUAA. Overall he is tied for third, with Toronto's Larry Hopkins, but behind Doug Caines and Cary Farrell, also from U of T.

Pagnello was voted the Most Valuable Player at the CIAU Championships in Edmonton last year. "I played a grinder type of series and luckily got a few points."

Rocci Pagnello: "He should be All-Canadian this year."

Gemmell is the more outspoken and praising of the two, Pagnello the more modest and subdued.

This is Pagnello's fourth year as a Blue, and "as far as I know, I'll be back next year. It's a lot of work, but practice makes a nice break in the day," he said. He is currently doing graduate work in Child Studies, as is teammate Doug Herridge.

Gemmell is in third year Arts. He transferred from Cornell this year, after two years on their varsity team. He likes the Canadian style of play better because, "the defencemen get to be more involved in the play. In the States the defence just dump the puck in."

Gemmell gives much of the credit for his success to his defence-mate. "I think my success is directly attributed to playing with Rocci. He's a good steady influence on me."

Pagnello is an excellent stickhandler and has moves that enable him to go through a whole team and score. "If I could stickhandle half as good as Rocci, I'd have 25 or 30 goals by now," said Gemmell. "He should be All-Canadian this year."

They are the most offensive minded of the Blues' defencemen. "We've got two great wingers (Dan Tsubouchi and Alex Jeans). They know we like to play the net and let us," Gemmell stated. "But in the playoffs we're going to have to check our indiscriminate rushing up the ice," added Pagnello.

The lack of fan support has disappointed both Pagnello and Gemmell, especially the latter who is used to playing before capacity crowds at Cornell. "I've really been disappointed in the support we've received this year. I think, up here, the students lack a sense of school identity," said Gemmell.

Pagnello elaborated. "Attendance has dropped in the last four years. If people don't want to come, we're not going to drag them into the arena. But for a buck, it's a good game, considering people are paying $15 to watch the Leafs play boring hockey."

Rob Gemmell says he has one prerequisite for the pros. "I've had my teeth knocked out."

Neither of the two is considering the prospect of playing pro hockey. They feel they aren't big enough or physical enough, to play the physical game of the pros. Gemmell explained, "I'm not big enough, but I've got one prerequisite for the pros — I've had my teeth knocked out."

Gemmell is a pretty good lacrosse player and thinks "that I've got a better chance in pro lacrosse. I think I've always been a good lacrosse player."

If this defensive duo keeps up their good work, you can look forward to Toronto doing well in the upcoming playoffs, and maybe even winning their third straight CIAU Championship.

Game of The Week

By JIM McLEAN

The Blue and White All-Star game played on February 8 at Varsity Arena looked like it was going to be nothing more than exercise for both teams. But both teams surprised the spectators by playing an exciting game in which the Whites defeated the Blues 4-2.

Like many professional All-Star games an early lack-lustre effort seemed imminent. However, except for the absence of physical contact, both teams appeared anxious to win. The Whites were the favourites however, because of the apparent higher calibre of play in their division.

The first period opened with many strong scoring drives by both teams. End to end play and strong goaltending provided the few spectators with a brand of hockey that seems near extinction. Even Varsity Blues coach, Tom Walt, appeared interested enough to remain.

With the play being so even a penalty by either team seemed the answer to a go-ahead goal. But when the Whites were riding short with only four players, the Blues couldn't seem to penetrate the goal because of the strong penalty killing line of Ken Kryklyw, Bruce Bonazza, Randy Lesco and Ed Boddy. It was this line that decided the outcome of the game as they held the Blues scoreless on all power plays.

It wasn't until halfway through the first period that the Whites put themselves on the scoresheet with an unassisted goal by Jeff Andrews.

Nearing the end of the period it looked as though the Whites were going to retire the first half with a 2-0 lead but were beaten by a goal post on a perfect two on one play to leave them with only a 1-0 advantage.

The second period scoring opened with a White goal by Rory O'Neill from Guido Mazza and Jeff Andrews. This scoring play was the result of the Blues violation of the last man back rule.

But later, to the Blues advantage, Whites Paul Damp earned himself two minutes for interference. This appeared to be the chance the Blues needed but couldn't capitalize as a result of the Whites' consistent penalty killing unit.

It wasn't until early in the third period that the Blues put themselves in the game with a goal by Jim Duffield from Bob Isles. Whites however retaliated with a third unassisted goal by Randy Lesco.

After this onslaught of goals the game appeared quite even, especially after Whites Wayne Kurnik earned himself a penalty for tripping. But again the Blues couldn't capitalize appearing content to sit back and play in their own end. This attitude however caught the Whites off guard as Blues' George Wong slid a backhand in behind goalie Mark Sedowski.

The Blues weren't to be left unanswered as Whites' Guido Manza banged in the final goal of the game to give his team a decisive 4-2 victory. Even a final chance to make a comeback was dampened by the Whites penalty killing unit as the Blues failed to score on a final power play advantage.

Except for the confusingly similar shades of sweaters which appeared to be at least ten years old, the game was played with a lot of class and vigor demonstrating that all individuals involved were real competitors. It's too bad that there aren't more All-Star games between the other interfac divisions. These games could only increase the competitiveness during regular season play and the play-offs.

Its Now Or Never For Cagers

By JIM O'LEARY

The 1977-78 season for the Basketball Blues has come down to one game.

In order to make the playoffs, Toronto has to beat the number-three ranked Laurentian University Voyageurs in a Saturday encounter in Sudbury. A loss, coupled with an almost certain Ottawa win over Ryerson, will give Ottawa the last playoff spot.

Laurentian is presently tied with the number-two ranked York Yeomen for first place in the Eastern Division of the OUAA. Both teams have 10-1 records and have beaten each other once.

Laurentian is led by their Philadelphia connection. In the wake of the loss of most of last year's veterans, coach Richie Spears went to the U.S. and recruited three American University Basketball veterans who played out of Philadelphia. These three — Bruce Burnett, Varick Cutler and Charlie Wise — control the game.

A look at the league statistics show Burnett leading in scoring with an average of 25 points per game. Right behind him are Cutler and Wise with 20 and 18 point averages respectively.

Wise is the sparkplug of the Laurentian offence. In order to conserve the energy of the big three, Wise deliberately sets a slow pace. From his guard position he directs a methodical attack, using as much of the clock as possible on each rush.

When Toronto faced Laurentian at the Benson Building last November, the Voyageurs used this style of play to rack up an 87-70 victory. Wise played his usual dominant role scoring 32 points.

The Blues' chance of an upset will lie in the hands of the veterans. Guards Doug Fox and Tim McGhie, who may be playing in their last game for Toronto, will have to produce on the scoreboard.

The most interesting match-up could be under the backboards where the two best rebounders in the province will be battling it out. Toronto's Randy Cook will face six foot, eight inch Cutler in a matchup that will decide the league's rebounding title. Cook currently leads by eight.

Thirty-one watchmen to go

By TOM KUHN

Thirty-one nightwatchmen were called in two groups Friday and Saturday by the U of T administration and told the university intends to phase out their jobs.

"The university has never before called in the nightwatchmen and spoken to them," said Bob Gibson, chief union steward for local 204 of the Service Employees International Union.

There have been several years of controversy surrounding the maintenance of the positions. Two years ago the administration's decision to lay off nightwatchmen was fought before Governing Council where the decision was reversed.

The nightwatchmen are not under notice of dismissal. The university first must get the approval of Governing Council at their meeting on March 16.

"I thought the insurance people always made sure there were nightwatchmen in the buildings. Otherwise the insurance rate skyrocketed," said Gibson on Saturday.

"After all, the buildings have to be watched. If there are no nightwatchmen, there are no night workers. The university has already moved custodians to afternoon shifts. If a water pipe breaks it won't be found until the morning. If a fire breaks out the police will have to sight it," said Gibson.

"It's opening the door to thieves," he added.

If any building is willing to pay for the nightwatchmen out of their own budget, they will be able to retain their nightwatchmen according to the university administration's proposal.

This possibility would preserve the jobs of 10 of the nightwatchmen, Gibson estimated. The rest have sufficient seniority to maintain their jobs in other functions in the university, Gibson said.

"Cleaning is clearly understaffed. Grounds maintenance is clearly understaffed," said Gibson. "Somebody is going to get the push. If it comes to a push, some people with low seniority will be laid off," he said.

A problem is that some of the nightwatchmen are old, and would not necessarily be able to do outdoor work. There is some difficulty in their flexibility, said Gibson.

In other university layoffs, three of the custodial staff at Erindale threatened with layoff have been transferred to afternoon shifts which saves night pay as well as electricity.

William Lye, Director of Physical Plant, was unavailable for comment.

Few summer jobs gov't agency admits

By KEN WHITEHURST

One in seven high school and university students will be unemployed this summer, admitted the head of the Ontario Youth Secretariat Terry Jones at a Wednesday press conference at Queen's Park called to explain the Government's youth employment programs.

There will be 700,000 students looking for jobs this summer, the Conservative MPP said, and like last year, 100,000 of those students will not find work.

Jones expects this many unemployed students even with Government programs to create jobs for students.

The Ontario Career Assistance Plan (OCAP), the Ontario Youth Assistance Plan (OYAP) and the Ontario Experience program will all continue in effect this summer.

OCAP was set up to help young people gain first time job experience by subsidizing the private and public sector hiring of inexperienced workers.

OYAP is a wage subsidy plan started last year. It provides employers with a dollar an hour subsidy for creating new summer jobs for young people.

Ontario Experience '78 is intended to provide students with career-related jobs. Jobs provided by Experience '78 will pay the provincial minimum wage.

OCAP is expected to provide 6,000 jobs, OYAP is expected to create 30,000 jobs and Experience '78 will hire 13,500 students.

The government is depending on private enterprise to provide 85 percent of the jobs that will be available for students. Jones admitted: "The effect of industrial cutbacks is, of course, the unknown variable."

Sixteen point one million dollars will be spent on Experience '78 and $26 million will be spent to pay for OCAP and OYAP.

In addition to the announced programs, the government will hire 10,000 young people as summer replacements for vacationing government workers.

New College fee up

By HEATHER HILL

New College Student Council (NCSC) voted almost unanimously Thursday to raise its compulsory non-academic fee to $14 from $12, beginning next year. The decision must be approved by Governing Council before the new fee is implemented.

In an open student council meeting, NCSC treasurer Dave Beaton argued that the $2 fee increase would be necessary to sustain the current level of student activities at New College. He pointed to increased costs for dance bands, office supplies and room rentals, calling these expenses "unavoidable."

Although the meeting to discuss the fee increase was publicized throughout the college, only student council members attended.

Some members suggested that a referendum be called to decide the question, noting that the issue was of direct concern to all New College students.

The referendum suggestion was rejected, however, after NCSC president Gary Elliott pointed out that submissions for fee increases to Governing Council must be made by March 1 if they are to take effect in the coming year. Elliott said it would be impossible to arrange a referendum in time to meet this deadline.

If Governing Council approves the fee increase, the New College Student Council expects its revenue to increase by approximately $5,000.

The recommendation for a fee increase was passed over one dissenting vote.

Secrecy over Grad Post a tactic, notes say

By ANDREW MAHON

Information recently received by The Varsity raises doubts about the alleged confidentiality of the current grievance procedure between CUPE local 1281 and the Graduate Students' Union (GSU) executive with regard to Grad Post editor

Maria Horvath's warnings of dismissal.

At an open meeting of the GSU last Wednesday, GSU vice-president Leo Casey stated that "confidentiality of the grievance procedure is such that on the advice of our lawyer we will not violate that confidentiality."

However, the minutes of a closed meeting held on Jan. 27 suggest that Casey himself advocated the "confidentiality" of the Horvath proceedings.

The minutes reveal that "Leo (Casey) recommended that if any of the GSU's executive members are approached by The Varsity, they should say that we are engaged in a confidential matter of a contractual nature and we are not allowed to comment."

The minutes also state three long-range problems specified by GSU treasurer John Johnson:

"1) Maria (Horvath) will probably try to grieve the warning letter. CUP is not sympathetic but the issue may become a legal matter.

2) the Varsity will probably try to report this.

3) If no improvement, he (John Johnson) would recommend closing the Grad Post for the rest of the year. This would have to go before General Council."

When contacted GSU treasurer John Johnson said he had "no comment" about the minutes from the closed meeting, but insisted that "it was a confidential matter."

Horvath described Casey's suggestion from the minutes of the meeting as "a tactic on their (GSU) part with no relation to the law."

Neither Casey nor GSU president William Stratton were available for comment.

MP urges Blacks: 'get into mainstream'

By MAUREEN ROACH

Lack of understanding between Black and White Canadians can only be remedied when each group recognizes its obligations, said Black MP Lincoln Alexander at the first Black history conference held at U of T last weekend.

"Blacks need to get out of the fishbowl into the mainstream," said Alexander. The conference's principal speaker urged that Blacks and other visible minorities be correctly represented in the media. He suggested increased Black programming and participation in media. Naïson Mawande, a representative of labor and human rights, emphasized Alexander's statement.

"Blacks are no longer visitors to this country. We are here to stay. It is incumbent upon the institutions to reflect our needs," said Mawande.

The conference, opened by U of T president John Evans, was designed, in his words, as a medium of inspiring new pride in Blacks as well as a greater respect and knowledge of them among other groups.

The problems encountered by Canada's Black citizens were related from a study undertaken by Wilson Head to the Ontario Human Rights Commission. Head said that of 300 Blacks interviewed, all had met with some form of discrimination ranging from employment to housing to police conflicts. The same study revealed that 47 per cent of the whites interviewed confessed to varying degrees of bigotry.

In response to problems detailed, Alexander exhorted the support of Black candidate Anne Cools for the Rosedale riding in the next federal election. He also suggested education for Blacks to fit them for their new roles. Political strategist Ian Francis urged student participation in the political arena.

Tremblay chez les anglais

By RICHARD SMALL

Beginning today U of T will be inundated by French-Canadian cultural presentations in the six days of Quebec Week.

The highlight of the week, organized jointly by the French department and New College, will be discussions with Quebec playwright Michel Tremblay and performances of his La Duchesse de Langeais at New College. The play, starring Jean Marc Amyot and directed by Eugene Gallant, will be presented at New College by the Troupe du Theatre du P'tit Bonheur.

A series of open discussion sessions with Tremblay will be held later in the week. An "English-only" session will be held Thursday.

Today the Deputy Minister of Culture in the Quebec Government, Pierre de Bellefeuille, will speak on "L'Actualité politique québécoise" at Victoria College. Other lectures include "Le langage du groupe Beau Dommage" (the French-Canadian rock group "La Dramaturgie de Michel Tremblay" and "Traducteur et Traduction en littérature Canadienne-Française.")

According to Department of French Acting Chairman Lawrence Kerslake, "We're particularly concerned with making French-Canadian culture better known not only on the U of T campus but also in anglophone Toronto." He pointed out that New College had invited Michel Tremblay to U of T and that "this seemed an ideal opportunity to build a French week around it."

Kerslake said that the department is expecting a good turnout not only from the campus but also from the community at large.

"I would hope that in particular people who would have some hesitation at attending the discussions in French with Michel Tremblay would come to the English session on Thursday." He also predicted a lively round table discussion with de Bellefeuille later today.

Other events include a Quebec cooking demonstration by "nouvelle cuisine" chef Boulanger, a wine-tasting session in Woodsworth College and a wine and cheese party at Trinity College.

A series of cafe-theatres and parties will be held at Victoria College, University College and Trinity College.

Erotica in Oshawa--one gallery's story of garters and glory

By GILLIAN O'Reilly

Showing erotic art to an Oshawa audience is one of the facets of Joan Murray's job as director of the Robert McLaughlin Gallery in Oshawa.

Murray, the fourth speaker of six in the Hart House lecture series, spoke to an audience of 15 on Wednesday night about the difficulties of managing a small art gallery.

Last year, a show by artist Dennis Burton, whose subject matter is mainly garter belts or female genitalia, brought the Oshawa police to investigate, Murray related. She told the police that she too thought the paintings were obscene and encouraged them to "close the show and make the gallery famous," but nothing was done. However, she said that the number of male visitors to the gallery increased dramatically.

The McLaughlin gallery was founded by the family to house the collection of works by Painters Eleven. Mrs. McLaughlin, who painted under the name Alexandra Luke, was a founding member of the group which produced some of Canada's most important and best known abstract artists, including the late Jack Bush.

The fact that the gallery is limited to the Painters Eleven theme has been "a strength," according to Murray. She had borrowed the guidelines to include "the sons of Painters Eleven and the grandsons and daughters." These are the second and third generations of both abstract and figurative artists who were taught or influenced by the original group.

The McLaughlin family never regarded their mother's collection of abstract art as anything of value, Murray said. She finds that the board of the gallery, composed mainly of businessmen, is equally wary of the collection in spite of having set the guidelines itself.

"Left to itself, the board would buy one Kriehoff a year," commented Murray. Instead, she makes the purchases, and every year gives the board "a lecture on how what she bought fits the gallery's guidelines."

Sometimes the gallery's shows do appeal to her conservative viewers with questionable results. A Terrible Beauty, a show of war art, was organized by the gallery last year to coincide with the publication of a book on the same subject. The show was so popular that Oshawa is now building a war museum at the cost of $6-million while the McLaughlin Gallery continues to work with a purchasing budget of $50,000.

Despite the frustrations of low budgets and lack of space, Murray emphasized her enjoyment in her job. "It can be very funny at times," she commented, referring to the incident with the police. Murray stated she is also interested in encouraging some of the regional artists.

Baum talks on sex and religion

By RICK BOGACZ

Gregory Baum, professor of religious studies at St. Michael's College, spoke in a lecture last week on the experience of the Bible as it applies to different facets of life including sexuality. Baum was participating in the third of a series of lectures to celebrate Sexual Awareness Week at U of T.

Baum, the author of a recently published book, Religion and Alienation, compared the religious interpretation of sex with that of the enlightenment. He said the arrival of the eighteenth-century movement towards rational thinking caused turmoil among religious institutions. Baum said followers of the Enlightenment were able to develop scientific and logical solutions to many of society's problems while the religious institutions could offer only abstract or spiritual answers.

Baum said the Catholic Church had trouble interpreting the ideas of the Age of Enlightenment. He said it had two difficult alternatives: to take up the new scientific theories and reject the old divine recognition or to reject the new and keep the old suppositions.

Baum said that Christians through the ages found edicts in the scripture stating that the personal nature of sex should be respected and not exploited. As equal partners, two individuals engaging in sex should be responsible for the production of children and the time when this production is curtailed.

Baum went on to describe three positions for arguing faith and sexuality. The first is a strict evangelical formulation of clear-cut rules regarding sexual behavior. The second, he asserted, is a more liberal outlook emphasizing the followers of the Enlightenment regarding sexual and religious matters. One's own sense of responsibility was the major characteristic of the third position, Baum said.

Since the second position has no basis in theological thought Baum concentrated on the other two. Baum said the third position is not a watering down of these rules but a totally different interpretation of the issue. He said the defenders of the first position would agree with a strict moral code protecting marriage. Yet the defenders of position three would insist that a failing marriage should be abandoned. Those who support this view must be able to measure the effects of their decision.

Baum explained that comparison of the two positions afforded fruitful conversation but added that people usually discuss only the means and not the end in this issue.

Prof: foreign ideas incite slave revolts

By NICK MAROTTA

Black slave revolts during the period of the American and French revolutions all travelled a common ideological path, said U.S. historian Eugene Genovese.

Speaking at Scarborough College on Friday, the Rochester university professor said that Afro-American slave revolts began in the slaves' desire to re-establish the primitive communal life they had been raised in.

However, Genovese said, his recent research reveals that the concepts of equality and freedom inherent in the American and French revolutions influenced the slave resisters to fight for freedom on ideological grounds.

Genovese said that slave revolts in Santa Domingo, Haiti and Venezuela experienced this same shifts in goals. He said Haiti shared the ideology of France to the extent that without the French revolution the revolt in Haiti would never have occurred. Genovese explained that Venezuelan rebels came into contact with French and Italian slaves who tried to disseminate ideas of democracy and republicanism.

Genovese pointed out that the United States did not experience any wide scale revolts such as the one in Santo Domingo. He attributed this to the American slaves' political awareness of their situation. Genovese cited the Fourth of July celebrations where slaves were made aware of their plight by speakers. He said that the slaves' preachers also spoke out against slavery by use of allusions in order to circumvent the masters' supervision. Slavery, argued these speakers, is incompatible with the American Declaration of Independence and its espousal of the liberty of the individual.

A strong planter class, said Genovese, accounts for the lack of large scale revolts in the U.S. They were aware of the possibility of slave revolts and took the necessary precautions, such as the establishment of slave patrols and lighter security.

Hands off Grad Post

As for the former fieldworker for the Ontario Region of Canadian University Press at the time the Grad Post was first admitted to CUP, I am very troubled by the current struggle between the paper and the Graduate Student Union executive.

When the Grad Post's application for full membership was discussed at CUP's national conference in December 1976, many delegates from other newspapers expressed their reservations about admitting that paper on the following points:

- the Grad Post did not appear to have sufficient political, editorial or financial independence from the GSU executive, as it should according to the central CUP principle of "freedom of the press"

- the paper did not have any guarantee of internal democracy since it lacked a staff list and any sort of collective discussion of its direction, as it should under the CUP principle of "staff democracy"

- the editor, being a unionized employee of the GSU, was not selected by the paper's staff, according to the CUP principle of "internal selection of editors"

Because of these reservations, the Grad Post's membership in CUP was made conditional on the acceptance of the following principles by the GSU:

1. that "in no case should a representative of the student government have the explicit or implied power of censorship, or to set editorial or advertising policies . . ."

2. that "the student newspaper should be free from outside financial control . . ."

3. that "overall policy decisions should be made through collective discussion by the staff, whenever possible . . ."

4. that "the editor of the school newspaper should be selected by the staff of the newspaper, not subject to the discussion of external bodies . . ."

These principles were accepted by the GSU executive on January 4, 1977 — but it appears the present executive has never given them a second thought.

I follow the present conflict with the growing suspicion that the GSU executive (for all their pseudo-progressive posturing) would prefer a house organ glorifying their particular sentiments, or even no graduate student paper at all, to a free and independent press capable of defining its own direction.

Trotsky and the state

The Trotskyist League's defense of the role of Leon Trotsky in the Russian Revolution conveniently ignores many disturbing facts, and grossly distorts the meaning of that Revolution. Leon Trotsky was the leader of the Red Army that slaughtered the Kronstadt sailors in their revolt against the new Soviet bureaucracy — a proletarian revolt from below. Trotsky was also one of the key persons responsible for putting down the peasant revolt in the Ukraine, especially the Mahkno movement which was a libertarian peasant movement having different ideas about the nature of social revolution from those of the Bolsheviks. In both of those revolts Trotsky was brutal and ruthless in the suppression of dissent when it was expressed by workers and peasants against their new "Red" bosses.

The Trotskyist League's explanation of the origins of the "degeneration of the Worker's State" is likewise misleading. The degeneration of the Russian Revolution did not begin with Stalin, or after him; the degeneration began only a few short months after the Oct. Revolution in 1917. Almost all marxists and leninists of whatever tendency have tried to explain the degeneration of the Russian Revolution as primarily due to the peculiar hardships that faced the Revolution, namely civil war, the threat of restoration forces and finally the encirclement by capitalism. This is rationalization pure and simple. The revolution began to decline when the Bolshevik Party took power and began to mold Russia in its image of "socialism". What was this image of "socialism" that drove the Bolsheviks? I believe that it was Lenin himself who defined socialism as "state capitalism plus electrification".

What went wrong in Russia? The root of this question strikes deep at the very heart of Leninism itself. For what went wrong was the very project of Bolshevism itself. The conquest of state power, the vanguard party, the dictatorship of the proletariat is what went wrong with the Russian Revolution. Socialism does not mean state power by a self-appointed elite no matter how "Red" they may be. Socialism is none other than complete workers' self-management in its fullest sense. Socialism means people organizing and directing their own lives and not placing that project in the hands of a self-appointed elite who will direct the building of "socialism" from above. Socialism will only be built by the workers themselves or it will not be built at all. The job of the conscious revolutionary is to assist the people in this task but not to govern them. "Red" bosses are as antithetical to true socialism as are "White" bosses — that is the true lesson of the Russian Revolution that the Trotskyist League and all the other Leninists have failed to understand.

Irish revolution

I was glad to see the article by Kathy Canty on C.C. O'Brien's speech at the Celtic Symposium. However, I was disheartened to see that no mention was made of the alternative view on Irish revolution as it was presented that day by Mr. John Montague after Mr. O'Brien's speech.

For those of us in the audience that afternoon not well acquainted with modern Irish history and politics

Mr. O'Brien's speech was forceful and his position clear, but it was Mr. Montague's rebuttal which brought the picture into focus.

History, especially that of ongoing struggles, is clearly not as simple as von Ranke's "wie es eigentlich gewesen".

Racism in Toronto

The Joint Committee, made up of the East Indian Defence Committee, West Indian People's Organization and the Canadian People's (Citizens and Residents) Defence Committee, wishes to address the U of T community on the question of the Pitman Report.

The report of the task force on Human Relations was submitted to the Council of Metro Toronto in November, 1977. Entitled "Now Is Not Too Late", the so-called Pitman Report has become a big topic of discussion and debate. The Pitman Report is based on private interviews with seventy policemen, fifty-one social workers and representatives of social service organizations, fifty educators and academicians and fifty-seven state officials and other agents of the state, including racist nazis like Don Andrews of the "Western Guard".

The Pitman Report has three main aims: 1) to absolve the Canadian state and its representatives in Toronto of the blame as the organizers of racist attacks on the immigrants from Asia, Africa and Latin America, especially those of East Indian origin, and to blame the people as being the cause of the racist attacks on the immigrant communities; 2) to tell the immigrant communities, especially the East Indian community, that they should not defend themselves but should rely on the state for protection when attacked by racists, and 3) to float agents in the communities and the opportunists in order to destroy resistance against racist attacks by splitting up these communities making them fight with one another.

Certain individuals and groups have lauded this report as the solution to racism in Toronto, and some of them have even been employed by the state to implement the recommendations of this report. THE JOINT COMMITTEE FIRMLY REJECTS THE "PITMAN REPORT".

The report is a sinister, racist attack on the immigrant communities, especially the East Indian and West Indian communities. It is designed to undermine the growing unity of the people in these communities in the fight against the state-organized racist attacks, and to incite the people against one another. In response to this attack, the Joint Committee has launched a vigorous campaign against this Pitman Report. We call on the people to unite against the Pitman Report and to further develop the struggle against state-organized racist attacks.

The conclusions of the Task Force are based on testimony of straightforward agents of the state in the immigrant communities. In turn, these agents in the ranks of the people are being employed to escalate the police activity against the East Indian and West Indian communities.

The Joint Committee calls on the people to expose and denounce the agents of the state in the immigrant communities.

The Pitman Report is the latest in a long series of state-organized attacks on the East Indian and West Indian communities which have been escalating since 1975. There was the racist and fascist "Green Paper" on Immigration, the huge increase in tuition fees for international students in Ontario post-secondary schools, the anti-immigrant Bill C-24, etc. The state-organized racist attacks have not been confined merely to propaganda and legislation. The state itself is now openly admitting that the RCMP led and financed the fascist "Western Guard" to attack the national minority communities in Toronto.

The Joint Committee calls on the people to expose and denounce the role of the reactionary Canadian state against the immigrant communities.

This campaign against the immigrant communities is being carried out in close collaboration with the opportunist traitors, who, while claiming to be against racist attacks, are working to undermine the resistance of the people. For a long time these opportunists have tried to create the illusion that they are on the side of the people, but their support for the line of the Pitman Report thoroughly exposes them as enemies of the people.

These opportunist traitors must be further exposed, weeded out and condemned.

Quebec: foreign students hit

MONTREAL (CUP) — Foreign students admitted to Quebec universities next year will pay about $1,000 more per year for tuition than their Canadian counterparts, the PQ government decided this week.

Rectors of Quebec's seven universities were told of the decision Feb. 14 at a meeting with Education Minister Jacques-Yvan Morin and Finance Minister Jacques Parizeau.

"Mr. Parizeau said the decision in principle had been taken and was irrevocable," McGill principal Robert Bell told Canadian University Press on Feb. 16. "Mr. Parizeau was very clear that we are going to go exactly along the lines of the Ontario system."

Last year Ontario became the first province to institute differential fees. It was followed by Alberta, which charges foreign students $300 more than Canadian students.

"We didn't argue with the decision," Bell said, "regrets were expressed, but there was no argument. I don't think there is any way it's not going to happen."

He said the cabinet has approved the principle of differential fees and only the details remain to be worked out. "The move was taken without consultation with the universities as far as I know," Bell said, "first I heard about it was the night before last (Feb. 14)."

Paul Lacoste, Rector of Université de Montréal, concurred. "We were not asked what we thought," he said.

Quebec Education Department officials refused to comment on the matter but Pierre Roy, an assistant to Morin, told Canadian University Press that the minister will be making a statement on the differential fees situation during the last week of February.

Approximately 15 per cent of students at Concordia University are here on student visas. At McGill visa students account for 11 per cent of the student population, and at Université de Montréal three per cent are visa students. There were no figures available for the four other Quebec universities affected by the decision.

Daniel Pacquet, Secretary-General of l'Association nationale des étudiants du Québec, said the decision came as no surprise to him. "We knew before that the PQ would align themselves with the actions of other provinces like Ontario and Alberta," he said.

"ANEQ has always upheld the rights of foreign students to have the same rights as Quebec students," he said, "and when we talk about free tuition, that applies to foreign students also."

ANEQ will be discussing the differential fee issue at their general meeting in March to formulate strategy in reaction to the government decision.

$ for business

OTTAWA (CUP) — Despite current education budget constraints, a management education group is urging governments to make business education a priority and universities to allocate more of their budgets to it.

Max Clarkson, chairperson of the Council of Deans of Faculties of Management and Business Administration, said during a recent meeting of the group's executive in Ottawa that thousands of qualified students have been turned away from business programs because institutions cannot accommodate them.

He said in a press release that as the demand is increasing — commerce and business enrolment increased eight percent this year — limited resources are preventing universities from fulfilling it.

The release said that while management schools account for 11 percent of total university enrolment, less than three percent of full-time faculty teach commerce and business administration and about three or four percent of university operating budgets are allocated to the faculties.

Canadian business schools plan to hire 200 new faculty in the coming academic year if they get the money, although Canadian universities annually produce less than a dozen PhDs in business, compared to about 1,000 in the United States.

The release said that recent studies show that few management graduates are unemployed, and that graduates have incomes about 25 percent higher than those earned by arts and science graduates.

Marxist economics

MONTREAL (CUP) — Economics students at the Université du Québec a Montréal (UQAM) are willing to strike unless the university hires professors capable of teaching Marxist economic theory.

The students told a Feb. 10 meeting of the department faculty, which is responsible for hiring new professors, that only one of the 18 economic professors at UQAM could teach Marxist theory.

According to a spokesperson for the student association, the students have been demanding Marxist professors since last year, when a survey of first-year students showed that 20 percent hoped to take courses with class analysis.

"Although Marxist and political economic critique is accepted throughout the world, and the existence of an antagonistic economic system has been proven, the university refuses to recognize this," the spokesperson said.

The professors' assembly refused to agree to student demands to ensure that two new professors to be hired soon be competent in Marxist analysis. But they said they will pressure the university administration to allow them to hire an additional professor who would teach Marxist theory.

McGill reassured

MONTREAL (CUP) — Quebec's minister of cultural development told McGill University faculty and administrators recently that he and the Parti Québécois government recognize McGill's "contribution" to the cultural and scientific life of the province and are anxious to contribute to McGill's development.

"As far as financing is concerned," said Camille Laurin, "the Parti Québécois has no intention whatsoever of asphyxiating McGill's evolution, whether directly or indirectly." To do so would be masochistic because Quebec society owes a great deal to McGill and wants to continue to profit from the university's resources, he said.

Laurin also argued against the assimilation of either the francophone or anglophone communities by one another. "The heritage of the French and English cultures is far too rich and diversified so that for us assimilation in one direction or another would be nothing else but a reduction of mankind's heritage."

Laurin said he personally detested

Bill 101, the province's new language legislation, but nevertheless felt it had become necessary to stop the assimilation of immigrants and francophones by the English community.

And he said that Bill 101 is far more generous toward McGill than Bill 22 — the previous language bill under the Bourassa government — because it allows all anglophone institutions to deal in English.

McGill vice-president for administration Leo Yaffe agreed during an interview later that Bill 101 was "fairer" than Bill 22 because it doesn't require anglophone institutions to carry out their business in French.

But Yaffe said he still opposed Bill 101 because it will persuade people to leave the province and means that anglophones rather than francophones will become bilingual.

But Yaffe admitted that McGill was being treated as well, if not better, by the PQ government than it was by the previous Liberal administration.

Occupation continues

MONTREAL (CUP) — Despite two evictions by Montreal riot police and the intransigence of the PQ government, 250 students at Montreal's CEGEP Andre Laurendeau continue to occupy that school's administration offices in their attempt to gain new athletic facilities.

The occupation began Feb. 6 and has, with the support of other Montreal CEGEPs, "Association nationale des étudiants du Québec" and the school's teachers and maintenance staff, become one of the most militant student actions in Quebec during this school year.

The Montreal regional of ANEQ plans a demonstration in front of the Ministry of Education office in Montreal to show the support the students have gained. An ANEQ spokesperson said the fight at Andre Laurendeau symbolizes the right of all students for adequate study and sports facilities.

"While the government plans to spend $15 million for the completion of the Olympic Stadium, the students of Andre Laurendeau are still waiting for their athletic complex," he said.

The occupation began after a general assembly where one half of the students registered at the college voted overwhelmingly in favour of an around-the-clock occupation of the administration offices.

The occupation proceeded peacefully for one week. Student leader Jean-Pierre Provost said, "There were 60 to 100 students here each night, and no courses were cancelled."

On Feb. 13 the school director general Gilbert Desrosiers, who told the students "there is nothing I can do," went to Quebec City to negotiate with the PQ government. That night 50 police entered the school and expelled the students.

The next morning 500 students assembled to discuss what course of action was open to them. Sylvia Roy, a member of the occupation committee, stated that "the PQ is our main enemy" in this affair.

She criticized the director general, saying "he didn't go to Quebec looking for a sports complex — he went there looking for a strategy to smash our struggle." And, after much debate the students decided unanimously to re-occupy the administration offices.

On Feb. 14 Desrosiers was back in the school accompanied by the Montreal riot squad. He read a prepared message to the students asking them to leave immediately but no one left until the riot squad expelled everyone and locked the doors. The next day 250 students re-occupied the offices; the administration cancelled all night classes, laid off all student employees and prohibited the use of the school's auditorium.

Last semester the students collected 3,000 signatures on a petition demanding construction of the sports complex. While there are only 1,500 students at the school, the petition was supported by the people living around the CEGEP, as well.

The sports complex has been planned since the school opened two years ago; both the Liberal and PQ governments have promised to build it. Sports is a compulsory course in Quebec CEGEPs.

The Levesque administration has said it doesn't have enough money to put into education. Responding to the government's explanation, the occupation committee said that students "will not pay for the economic crisis because we are not the ones responsible for the government's lack of funds."

Evans' hype all ready for upcoming election

By ANDREW MAHON

Dear Pierre,

Since I will now be affiliated with you and the gang, I thought I'd compose a little bio information for my campaign in the Rosedale riding. (I believe they call it "hype" in the business.)

Anyway, I hope you like some of this stuff, I think it accentuates my good points rather well.

Hoping to see you on TV,
John

Attention Rosedale residents! Do you want change? Do you want a man who can take tough stands on important issues? Of course not. That's why you should vote for John Evans.

Why? Why not. He's tough, he's decisive and he's John Evans. The name says it all. A vote for John Evans is a vote for... John Evans. (I guess I'll have to work on that part.)

Let the facts speak for themselves:

John Evans: Born of pioneer parents in fur-lined log cabin in tough, primitive Rosedale.

John Evans: Excelled in medical profession while fighting his way to the top of the Chinchilla breeding trade in his spare time.

John Evans: Leader of a large downtown campus. A man who knows how to form a committee without batting an eyelid.

John Evans: A family man who knows what it means to have children and watch educational television.

John Evans: A sportsman who held the position of goalie for the prestigious Innis College Dart team.

But what are the people saying about John Evans? A random selection of ordinary people revealed these illuminating comments:

"Dr. Evans is the kindest, most generous man I've ever met. I'm sure he'll do a creditable job... Even if he doesn't I'm still prepared to vote for him!... (Mrs. Evans... Rosedale Economist)

"Don't let those years at University fool you, John Evans is still capable of providing tough leadership at the federal level... I should know I've worked with him!... (Willy (the lug) Nelson... parking attendant)
"His taste in food is tough, demanding and shrewd. I've never met a man with Evan's appeal... He never orders a la carte!... (Chuck Wipple... Maitre D' at Winstons)

"I don't know who John Evans is. But if I did, I'm sure I'd be impressed... I ought to be, I'm Joe Clark! (Joe (put the camera on me) Clark... opposition leader)

"SHORT PEOPLE GOT... NOBODY..."

Quebec universities

MONTREAL (CUP) — Quebec's commission of inquiry into universities released a preliminary report in early February which purposefully provided more questions than answers concerning the future of Quebec's universities.

The report included the findings of the commission's three work groups studying teacher training, the university in Quebec society and institutional organization.

Its main intent was to lay the groundwork for the commission's public hearings scheduled to begin in April and end in June.

The commission, headed by Pierre Angers of the Université du Québec à Trois Rivières, was formed by the Parti Québécois government last July in an effort to deal with the changing nature and rapid growth of Quebec universities.

Post-secondary education in Quebec has changed considerably in the past 15 years. In 1963, the ministry of education was established to relieve the Catholic church of its control of education. Soon, three new universities were created: the University of Sherbrooke, Sir George Williams and the University of Quebec — the latter with a network of campuses across the province.

And between 1967 and 1970, 34 general and vocational colleges (CEGEPs) were established to replace the church-owned classical colleges.

Despite what was generally regarded as great progress in post-secondary education, discontent among students and faculty occurred throughout the 1970s over a myriad of issues.

That the university was in a state of "crisis" and needed re-evaluation became obvious in 1977 with faculty strikes at Laval University and the Université du Québec à Montréal — the longest academic strikes in the history of North America.

This was the "context" in which the Angers commission was formed, said Louis Marcl-Lacost, a McGill researcher and official with the commission.

Education Minister Jacques-Yvan Morin accordingly proposed immediate settlement of the wage issues and set up the Angers commission to deal with the larger problem of university structure.

Red Cross is out for blood for second time

Today marks the opening of the second Blood Cross blood donor drive on the U of T campus.

Activities officially begin at noon with a wine and cheese party in the Dean's Conference Chamber of the Medical Sciences Building. Facilities for giving blood are housed in the lobby of same building.

1978 marks the 20th anniversary of blood donor clinics in Toronto. Last fall, U of T broke another record — the university gave the greatest number of pints of blood in its history: The Faculty of Dentistry is the current holder of the U of T Blood Donor Clinic cup and is expected to take on any challengers this spring.

U of T's next president, James Ham, is expected to participate at the opening ceremonies, as well as student council president John Tuzyk, SAC vice-president Dave Jones said that all students are urged to attend the clinic and are invited to the opening ceremonies.

From the Varsity Research Group:

Proficiency tests unproven - are we less literate today?

The Varsity Research Bureau is investigating student issues; the following article was researched and written by Bruce Hain, Eric McMillan, and Pat Muldowney (with assistance from Eileen Capes).

The scene is registration week one balmy September afternoon at the St. George Campus. Robbie Rowe, a frosh, has just signed away his summer earnings. Robbie receives his ATL card and wonders what the numbers 801237640 mean. He is told to report to Room 222...

On arrival, a dour looking gentleman hands him two pieces of foolscap and tells him to take a seat. He informs Robbie he has forty-five minutes to write a brief essay on one of: "What did I do this summer?", "Would Martians be friendly?" or "The Aesthetic Highlights of the CN Tower."

Robbie completes the exercise and is told to wait outside while his paper is evaluated. Five minutes later, the door opens. In a grave voice, Robbie is told, "This paper just ain't good enough for this here place. May I have your ATL card, please? Your refund will be sent in the mail."

Sound too far fetched? Well, a bit.

But by 1980 Arts and Science students at U of T will be required to pass an English proficiency test in order to continue at university. Failing the test will force a student to enrol in a non-credit remedial grammar course. A student who fails to rewrite the test successfully by the end of the first year will be refused readmission for the next year.

This latest ruling comes in the wake of two years of publicity about the "literacy crisis" among university students. Proficiency testing is not a recent phenomenon, but only in the past few years has growing pressure brought it into the limelight.

In Ontario we have seen tests initiated at the University of Waterloo, University of Guelph, Queen's University, and Erindale College. The tests began as indicators of student competence but some institutions have been developing them into full-scale programs, in which students must pass a proficiency exam before continuing their studies or receiving their degree.

But is there really a "crisis"

Are students more "illiterate" today than in some past Golden Age? Recent news articles and pronouncements by academics seem to accept this as established

"... reading skills are probably better today than they ever were and where they have to do mathematics or arithmetic. I won't comment on writing because I never could write and still can't."

fact. But no one has yet brought forth any evidence to support this claim, other than anecdotes and tests of English proficiency among today's students. Following is a selection of comments and test results which indicate there has been no sudden decline of literacy among university students in the past two years nor is there consistency in test results;

1917 Harvard University

English composition courses were first initiated in the United States at Harvard, where the faculty noted students did not write correct, coherent and idiomatic English. A 1917 English Journal article was later summed up as indicating, "Few branches of educative work are attacked more frequently or more bitterly on the score of inefficiency. Only the totally uninitiated any longer suppose that the conversation and the personal or business correspondence of college students is either precise or elegant."

1926 Perdue University

In 1928 a report on Perdue freshmen two years earlier was summarized as follows: "What is Absence of punctuation in compound sentences which require it; uncertain punctuation of restrictive and non-restrictive clauses, and participial modifiers. 2. Two-in-one sentences; half-sentences; idiom. 3. Weak references of pronouns. 4. Capitals in titles and in quoted sentences."

1951 U of T English students

A test of U of T English students in the first three years resulted in a 65 per cent failure rate.

U of T president Sidney Smith called this "alarming" and said the results would probably be worse in non-English courses. Curiously, the Globe and Mail reprinted his deficient preparation for work in college English? In most cases it is simply the inability to write clearly or correctly. Sentences are run together without capital letter or period to indicate the division. Subordinate clauses are written as if they were complete sentences. A dozen or more mis-spelled words may be found on a single page of manuscript. Errors in grammar abound; adjectives are used as adverbs; singulars appear when plurals are required; there are pronouns without antecedents; verbs without subjects, and subjects without verbs. Crucities of the playground and street appear in serious writing. The idea is often lost in a maze of vague phrases."

1932 Massachusetts

A Report of a Study of the Secondary Curriculum in Milton, Mass., noted "a large sampling of writing at the college entrance level" indicated problems with 1.

statements in 1976, twenty-five years later, after running an editorial on "Campus illiterates."

1975 U of T Engineers

In December 1975 an English proficiency test for students in Applied Sciences and Engineering found 18.8 per cent unacceptable.

1976 University of Waterloo

During the summer 800 students and two reporters from the Kitchener-Waterloo Record wrote a proficiency test which included such essay topics as "How to put on a coat!" and 106 multiple choice questions. One record reporter and 39 per cent of the students failed the test.

1976 Queen's University

A highly-publicized test of Queen's freshmen by Professor Colin Norman reported that only 2.5 per Marking essays is necessarily a subjective business. As shown in the above article, a wide variety of standards can be applied. One university has thrown out proficiency testing altogether as being unreliable.

The Erindale tests

Below are sample results from the test at Erindale. They were graded "Pass," "Bare Pass," or "Fail." Can you guess how each of these scored? Bear in mind that they were marked mainly according to organization, coherence, spelling and structure rather than sophistication and content. Also remember that such a test may be used in the future to determine whether or not a student continues in his or her studies, be they arts, science or professional studies:

"Can we ever be truly free?"

"In answer to this question of personal freedom or freedom as a society, I would have to look around and see just how we ever could be. From the physical sense of being bound on this planet earth the emotions of family ties and responsibilities all bar us from the heaven-held image of complete freedom."

"How important is the past?"

"Events in the past affect what a person does in their future, making the past extremely important. A child learning to read relies on his newly acquired alphabet to assist him. Therefore the alphabet of the past is used as a building block."

"What role should the CBC play?"

"In this point of time the Canadian society faces many pressures. The Canadian Broadcasting Company should play a vital role in directing Canadians toward a common goal. That goal being the unification of Canada as one nation."

Title unknown

"One small step for man, one giant leap for mankind", exclaimed Neil Armstrong as he planted man's first step on the moon. In slightly more than ten years, mankind went from unmanned satellites to men on the moon. Now, we are about to enter the age of shuttlecraft."

To be fair, we must point out these are only opening paragraphs from the essays which were marked in their entirety. The first one received a "Fail" rating although the student received a grade thirteen English mark of 72 per cent and overall average of 66. The second was a "Bare Pass" although the student's grade thirteen average was 73.6 per cent and his English marks 76 and 77. The third essay was also a failure, the student having graduated from high school with 66 in English and an overall average of 67. The final example was a "Pass," the student's grade thirteen English mark being 64 and his overall average being 71.8 per cent.

Students at Erindale were tested this year.

Literacy testing has been around since

cent of students were "literate," 26.3 per cent were "reasonably literate," 37.2 per cent were "potentially literate," 15.2 per cent were "semi-literate," and 18.9 per cent were "illiterate," according to the Globe and Mail which headlined the article "71 per cent can't express themselves properly." A Queen's student wrote a letter to the editor pointing out the study was done by going over exams written by students tested.

1977 Erindale College, U of T

In the first large-scale experiment at U of T, a test of 1,145 freshmen resulted in 43 per cent of students failing. Almost a quarter of Ontario scholars (averages of 80 per cent or more) failed the writing test.

Students were allowed forty minutes to write a page on one topic out of five. The topics were arranged in categories: philosophical, Canadian life, familiar student topics, whimsical, or scientific-sociological. Sample topic questions included, "How important is the past?", "The ideal city," "The role of the CBC," "Are Canadians too timid?", "Are Schools Prisons?" and "The Joy of Cooking."

The test was marked by a team known as the Associates of Erindale, composed of ex-high school teachers and wives of professors at Erindale. They were instructed to look for a "minimal standard of competence" in each paper before grading it Pass or Fail. The markers were told not to be too concerned about the sophistication and content of the paper, but to concentrate more on organization, coherence, spelling and structure.

Each paper was marked twice; if there was disagreement between the markers the paper was checked again and assigned the third mark. Students were notified about their results. Non-compulsory remedial classes were offered to those who failed.

Despite this evidence, or lack of evidence, pronouncements on the decline of literacy continue. After the Queen's report, for example, the Globe and Mail editorialized, "Each time a report on the decline of literacy among high school and university students is released, we console ourselves that at least its results can't be any worse than the results of the previous study. And each time we are wrong. The discouraging word just gets more discouraging." The Globe also interpreted the results of the Queen's test as showing "of every forty students who entered first year in 1975-76, only one was properly literate in English. Only one" — a gross exaggeration of test results which are dubious in the first place.

This kind of reporting has led one academic, William Cowan, head of Carleton's linguistics department, to lash out at the "knee-jerk, unthinking journalistic attitude toward everything" and at newspaper stories which examine the language competence issue with "all the depth and power and reality of a television commercial."

basics forces at U of T.

Not only is there no evidence of a decline in competency, but the Ontario government's Secondary-Post Secondary Interface Study, released in January 1977, said:

There is strong evidence that the group of students passing through the interface between secondary and post-secondary studies is as well-educated and as well-prepared in basic skills as were similar groups in Ontario in the past and as are comparable groups of students in other countries.

Suppose we leave aside for now the question of whether literacy was more common in the past, and examine how it is currently tested.

Various methods of proficiency testing have been rejected over the past 100 years. Parsing and paraphrasing excerpts from literature were thrown out at the turn of the century.

Interestingly, doubt has occasionally been cast on the validity of the essay as a test of proficiency. Most students have heard stories about plagiarized essays being given different marks by different profs. One of the authors of this article had the experience of getting a D-plus for an essay only a little revised from a B-plus essay in the same course the previous year. In 1939 Philip Ballard, a member of students who are always told to get the points down as quickly as possible and not to worry about matters of style.

1976 University of Guelph

Guelph administered a test to its freshmen on a trial basis. Although the resultant report said there was a problem with students' writing skills, a university subcommittee surveyed several tests and could find "no one test whose reliability had been proven." The tests have been discontinued at Guelph for that reason.

1977 University of Waterloo

The second year of tests at Waterloo resulted in 42 per cent of freshmen scoring below 50. It was later discovered that there was little correlation between poor marks on the test and subsequent performance in university by

Some universities are making admissions contingent on test results.

However, other professors have joined the crusade. John F. Sullivan, head of Windsor's English Department, for example, writes the problem is "literacy is not a requirement for admission to Queen's and I'm sure the situation is much the same at every Ontario university." And then there's Erindale's own Desmond Morton who has been leading the back-to-

One need only look at the variety of testing methods that have been used over the years to understand the great difficulties in evaluating "language proficiency." Among them have been reading comprehension exercises to measure perceptual speed, parsing drills to test knowledge of grammar, and tests more closely related to literature, testing either knowledge the English Committee of the International Institute Examinations Enquiry, reported that ten examiners, highly recommended and given the same marking instructions, gave one essay grades of 15, 48, 52, 62, 63, 64, 69, 71, 75 and 78. He also showed that half of the examiners gave a different mark to the same essay marked at different times, including

WHAT I DON'T GET IS WHY I GOTTA WRITE THE TEST, AND NOT THE TEACHERS THAT PASSED ME IN GRADE THIRTEEN.

Tests inconsistent

of selected works or the ability to analyze given excerpts. General knowledge tests have usually contained a multiple choice section on vocabulary and one on spelling. Recent tests have combined any of the above with an essay test. At Erindale, for example, such a combination has been proposed for freshmen next September.

In 1940 Eugene M. Hinton studied the "Qualities of Style in Rhetoric Found in English Compositions" in which he discerned six items "determining superior merit" (beginning, climax, ending, paragraphing, sentences, word choice) plus three principles of composition (coherence, emphasis, unity) and no less than twenty-nine qualities of composition:

clarity - enthusiasm - sensitiveness - colour - form - sequence - conciseness - interest - sincerity - convincedness - maturity - fluency of style - definiteness - organization - naturalness of style - delineation - originality - less prosaicism -

"Pass" verdicts changing to "Fail" and vice-versa.

This is not to say the value of the essay as a teaching tool is doubted but that its value as a means of testing "literacy" is precarious. The teaching of English has many facets — establishment of reading habits, ability to use language for effective speech, writing and thought, and cultivation of self-expression as an art form — of which only the second can be standardized to any degree.

And do the current literacy tests actually test "effective speech" or "effective communication"? Moreover, do chemistry students or other science students need to be able to turn out good essays in order to be considered effective communicators in their fields?

In the next issue we'll look at the justification for these tests, "academic excellence," limiting enrolments and the connection with cutbacks and funding.

In accordance with the University of Toronto Act, 1971 the remainder of the Governing Council will be composed of the President and the Chancellor (ex-officio), two presidential appointees, sixteen appointees of the Lieutenant Governor in Council, and eight members who are not students or members of the teaching or administrative staff elected by and from among the alumni.

The election will be conducted by mailed ballot, ballots to be mailed to eligible voters on or about March 3rd, 1978. Ballots may be returned to the Governing Council Secretariat, Room 106, Simcoe Hall, by Canada Post, Campus Mail, or personal delivery.

Ballots must be received, by mail or personal delivery, at the Governing Council Secretariat by 12:00 noon Thursday, March 16th, 1978 in order to be valid.

Any eligible voter who receives an incorrect ballot, or no ballot due to an error in records, may contact the Governing Council Secretariat, phone 978-6576 in order to obtain the correct ballot.

Details of the contested constituencies are outlined below, along with biographical or other comments supplied voluntarily by the candidates.

The election is conducted by the Governing Council under the authority of the University of Toronto Act, 1971. Any inquiries should be directed to the Governing Council Secretariat at 978-6576. The election will close at 12:00 noon on March 16th, 1978.

Teaching Staff:

"Teaching Staff" means the employees of the University, University College, the constituent colleges and the federated universities who hold the academic rank of professor, associate professor, assistant professor, full-time lecturer or part-time lecturer unless such part-time lecturer is registered as a student. ("Lecturer" includes associates and clinical teachers in the Faculty of Medicine, and associates in the Faculty of Dentistry. The categories of tutor and senior tutor are considered equivalent to that of "lecturer for purposes of Governing Council elections only".)

Teaching Staff Constituencies:

In all cases a teaching staff member's constituency will be determined on the basis of his major teaching appointment to a faculty, college or school. Only in the case of a teaching staff member without a teaching appointment to a faculty, college or school, will his constituency be determined by another appointment. Teaching staff who hold a concurrent non-academic or academic non-teaching appointment will vote in the appropriate teaching staff constituency.

Constituency VI — one seat — all teaching staff members in the Faculty of Education, Graduate Department of Educational Theory and the Faculty of Library Science.

Alan C. Coman

Prof. Alan Coman, during the past six years, has held the following elected offices: six years of the U.T.F.A. Council; three years on the Advisory Board of F.E.U.T.; and two years as Chairman of F.E.U.T.'s Faculty Council, its Executive Committee, and its Salary and Tenure Committees. Currently, he serves on the university's A.C.E.D. Committee, is Chairman of the Dean's Committee on Faculty Evaluation, and is Vice-President of the Ontario Council of Teachers of English.

Tom Goodenough

A university is a public trust and must not be treated as a political instrument. Staff, students and administrators have equal interests in optimum scholarship, organized resources and research. Governing Council must secure this. In principle, students, staff and administration are one. In the light of the Macdonald Report we enter a new and more complex situation. We are equally important to each other. We must find an equitable modus operandi.

James William Greig

Dr. James W. Greig is Co-ordinator of Continuing Education and Graduate Studies in the Faculty of Education. He is also a member of the Graduate Department of Educational Theory. Currently Professor Greig is an appointed member of the Subcommittee on Curriculum and Standards of the Academic Affairs Committee. He has served on Woodsworth College Council, Innis College Council and presidential committees on the Division of University Extension and FEUT-OISE relationships. His chief interest is modern international studies.

Charles E. Pascal

Charles E. Pascal has a Ph.D. in Psychology and Education. He was with the McGill Centre for Learning and Development since its inception in 1969 to 1977. He has published widely in the area of teaching and learning and higher education. Currently, Dr. Pascal is Chairman of the Higher Education Group and the Director of the Ontario Universities Program for Instructional Development.

Graduate Students

"Graduate Student" means all students registered in the School of Graduate Studies.

Constituency II — one seat

All students registered in the Graduate Department of Educational Theory; Division III (Physical Sciences) of the School of Graduate Studies; Division IV (Life Sciences) of the School of Graduate Studies.

David L. Tennenhouse

Experience: I have had 2 years previous Governing Council experience as a co-opted member of the Subcommittee on Curriculum and Standards and the Academic Appeals Board. This complements three years of student council experience at various levels. I am presently a graduate student in Electrical Engineering. Issues: — Toronto must press for special funding in recognition of the excellence of our graduate programs. — Equitable levels of funding for graduate programs, research and fellowships must be maintained.

Jacqueline Tetroe

I am currently a first year doctoral student in Educational Psychology at OISE, having completed both my B.A. and M.A. at the University of Western Ontario. My relevant experience includes serving as Chairperson for the Graduate Affairs Committee at the U.W.O. Psychology Department, and as a member of the OISE Institute Assembly. I am willing to work hard to be truly representative of students' interests as a Governing Council member.

Full-Time Undergraduates

"Full-Time Undergraduate Student" means all students registered at the University in a programme of full-time study who are not registered in the School of Graduate Studies. All students in Arts and Science, on all campuses, for electoral purposes, will be considered full-time if enrolled in four or more courses, including students at Scarborough College.

Constituency I — two seats

All students registered in the Faculty of Arts and Science including Erindale College and students at Scarborough College.

Jules Bloch

Jules Bloch a political science student, has been involved in collegial politics in Quebec for the past two years. During this time he served as External Liaison Officer for the Vanier College Student Union and as chairman and spokesman for the Caucus of Anglophone Post-Secondary Students. His record with these organizations was impeccable and he feels that he will bring the same degree of conscientiousness to the Governing Council. For a conscientious council member vote for Jules Bloch.

Donald Arthur Guloien

"I find it difficult to be a non-participant at a time when tuition costs are increasing, class sizes are reaching epidemic proportions, and the community is questioning the value of a university education." Memberships: Faculty of Arts and Science General Committee; Social Sciences, Commerce Curriculum Committees; Hart House Standing Committees; Commerce Students' Association Executive; AIESEC. Donald hopes that a reasoned, non-antagonistic approach to governing will best serve the interests of a well-balanced student body.

James Hawker

My name is James Hawker. I work for Jesus and stand for all that he stood for when he was on earth. I have absolutely no experience in politics or governing anything except my own life which I believe is all the experience I need. I am running for this position because I want to learn — by experience — by whom to what ends this university is being run, and then to make responsible stands.

Frank Pegolo

—SAC Board of Directors 1977-78 — Member of Erindale College Council 1977-78 —Member of Executive Committee of Erindale College Council 1977-78 I feel that there should be more student input on Governing Council. This can be achieved by fighting for more student representation on Governing Council.

Part-Time Undergraduates

"Part-Time Undergraduate Student" means all students registered at the University in a programme of part-time study who are not registered in the School of Graduate Studies. All students in Arts and Science, on all campuses, will be considered part-time if enrolled in less than four courses, including students at Scarborough College.

Constituency I — two seats

All part-time undergraduate students.

Bev Batten

Part-time undergraduate students need strong representation on the policy-making body of this university. As Office Assistant for the Association for Part-time Undergraduate Students, I deal daily and directly with part-time undergraduates' concerns. I attend APUS Assemblies, executive meetings, and have represented part-time students at provincial and national conferences. I have served on several important university committees including the General Committee of the Faculty of Arts and Science and Governing Council's Planning and Priorities Subcommittee.

John Dadds

John Dadds has been a part-time student at Erindale College for three years. A 37-year-old father of four, including three highschool students, he is a career police officer serving with the OPP. He envisions a seat on the Governing Council as an opportunity to bring forward the benefits of life-experience gained by mature part-time students. His voice will be one that has shared the frustration and stress of combining work and study.

Joseph S. Garten

—Garten has been renominated and will stand for election again as one of Ward Eleven's two trustees on the Toronto Board of Education. —Garten is serving a two year term on The Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science. —Garten voted in favour of testing the English proficiency of students entering the Faculty in 1980. —Garten opposes the Macdonald Report's attempt to further weaken the student estate's power over academic affairs and resource planning.

Sandra Jolley

The interests and needs of part-time undergraduate students have concerned me since coming to the University of Toronto in 1973. I have been a class representative for APUS and currently sit on the Governing Council. My focus of study is political science; I am a homemaker, registered nurse and an administrative assistant to a professional nurses' association. I ask for your support and your vote. You will be served with vigour, integrity and good will.

Artist known for his wolves

By JEFF BUCKSTEIN

"The most important thing for me is to have a thorough knowledge of the animal I paint, so that their individual personalities come through," says artist Paul Harpley, whose wildlife paintings are now on display at the Scarborough College Art Gallery.

Harpley, 23, is a fourth-year physical geography major at Scarborough. He is also an artist, known in many artistic circles for his wildlife paintings. In June 1976 Harpley displayed his work at the Wildlife Gallery in Toronto, along with such artists as Robert Bateman and J. Sharkey Thomas. Last February, Harpley displayed two of his paintings on wolves at a showing in the Bank of Montreal Tower. Scarborough College has been exhibiting his paintings for the past three years.

"I was always good in art in school," explained Harpley. While he was in Grade 11, some of Harpley's paintings were displayed on Yonge Street. But in Grade 12 he dropped art.

"It wasn't until I stopped taking art as a subject, and began meeting professional wildlife artists, especially Anker Odum of the Royal Ontario Museum, that I began to develop as an artist."

For the past five years Harpley's main theme in his painting has been wildlife but lately he has tried to paint in other areas.

"I want to go more into portraits. In this show one of my paintings shows an orphan bear with a person. The painting is called 'Louise and Orphan Bear Cub'. I painted it while I was working at Algonquin Park last summer."

During the summers of 1976 and 1977 Harpley worked for the Ministry of Natural Resources at Algonquin Park and was presented with the opportunity of painting a landscape he had come to know well from first-hand experience.

"I never have any shortage of ideas on what to paint. I have about 20 ideas in my head right now, and I'm always thinking about how I can paint them."

Harpley explained his procedure for transferring an idea from his mind to the canvas.

"First, I make a sketch on a small pad where I make my different settings and arrangements. When I'm satisfied with that, I transfer the outline onto the large canvas and try to get the proper proportions. When I feel satisfied then I start painting. Once I start I'm into it. I don't quit easily."

Harpley said that he keeps a file of different objects which he might paint, such as small tree branches, to help him with detail when he sits down to actually paint the objects in his mind.

Harpley admitted that it is difficult to concentrate on a painting for a long period of time. "Usually I work late at nights, say from eleven to one. I have homework (from his five science subjects plus a Canadian art course he is taking on the side) and I also work as a hockey referee and a skatemarshal." But he said that painting was generally "very relaxing — though not when you first start."

Harpley, a member of the Federation of Ontario Naturalists and the Royal Canadian Geographical Society, doesn't think it is too difficult for an artist in Canada to make a reasonable living at his profession — "not if you're good and willing to work hard." But he criticized Canadian art, especially wildlife art, for becoming "fairly commercial; there are too many people in it who are not doing very well." However, the overall high standard remains, he claimed, because "the good people are still there and they're working hard."

Harpley said he'd like to combine his artistic talent and academic education to earn a living. "I'd like to use my degree for some line of work in environmental studies."

Wonderful Whores: sequined sour grapes

When a show is as disastrously bad as The Wonderful Whores, it would seem useless to review it; after all, why kick a corpse? In this case, however, the corpse happens to be kicking back, although pretty feebly.

The Wonderful Whores is a satirical revue at the Poor Alex Theatre that isn't. John Herbert has devised an evening of skits interspersed with female impersonations. The company of amateur actors provide the skits and the impersonations are provided by John Herbert. The Globe and Mail's recent review of the evening praised John Herbert's writing and called the acting "excruciating". Let me correct this misconception right away. The acting may be "excruciating", but Herbert's script is worse; it's nasty, self-indulgent and totally unfunny.

The skits are supposed to be satirical—the Trudeau's, the Theatre Passe Muraille, and a Canadianized version of Hamlet (inventively titled Omelette, oh well...) are the subjects. Unfortunately, the satire runs from limp to non-existent. An example of Herbert's satirical barb: an actor comes forward and shouts "Gina Hammer" and another corrects him "No, Mallet". Herbert does not satirize his subjects, he merely snickers at them. He seems to think that merely putting famous people on stage and mentioning topical subjects is satire. This show has no centre, no point of view. Herbert makes no points about anything or anyone, he starts out with passable ideas, but then lets them dribble away into pointless one liners and bad puns.

Correction. The show does have a centre, of sorts. But it's not an idea; it's an emotion, in these case nastiness. John Herbert's female impersonations are more than merely self-indulgent. It's not only that there are some fine female impersonators, such as Craig Russell, who put John Herbert to shame; it is also that Herbert uses his Wonderful Whores to get his rocks off about Canadian theatre, and to be particularly nasty. Now satire should be nasty, but Herbert is nasty about his own personal pet peeves which really don't interest us at all. For instance, as Judy Garland, Herbert talks about what it's like to be a has-been success. He equates his bad experiences with Canadian theatre with Garland's tragedy.

But let's not dignify this production. What is wrong with Canadian theatre according to John Herbert? Basically the fact that he is not a major, functioning part of it now. Canadian theatre has it's problems, including the complacency in the larger theatres, the lack of good dramaturgy in the smaller theatres, and an over-concern for Canadian content that blurs any concept of standards. These are points that Herbert suggests, but basically avoids.

In fact there is very little biting Canadian satire anywhere. Perhaps Canadians don't care enough, or there is nothing in Canada exciting enough to get upset about? Is John Herbert, taking feeble pot shots at his own pet peeves, the best satire we can come up with?

The skits and impersonations in this show are with few memorable exceptions boring, rambling and uninspired. And Herbert's acting is embarrassing. In Herbert's earlier play Fortune and Men's Eyes, the wise-cracks were in a different, more purposeful context, and nobody cared whether or not the jokes were good. The Wonderful Whores depends on its jokes (which are bad) and there is no context, no purpose. The author of Fortune and Men's Eyes owes himself and us better than this petty backbiting. Someone has to say it: The Wonderful Whores isn't good satire, it's simply sour grapes cloaked in tacky sequins.

Ross, Sparling Shine In OWIAA Meet

By HUGH STUART

Almost single-handedly, the duo of Jill Ross and Jean Sparling gave the Lady Blues the OWIAA indoor track and field championships at the CNE last Saturday. In regaining the championship from Western, Ross and Sparling earned 64 of U of T's 98 points.

Due to her bout with the flu, Coach Andy Higgins was surprised that Ross even made it out of bed on Saturday morning. Her opponents must have wished that she hadn't.

Ross demolished the field in the 600 metres, won the long jump, anchored the second place sprint medley relay team, and finished third in the high jump. Not a bad day's work!

Midway through the meet, Canadian national team member Jean Sparling said, "There's no fire in me today. I've been sick all week. I really don't want to risk getting sick again by overworking because I've got the Canadian nationals at Montreal next weekend."

Obviously Sparling had enough fire. She avenged her defeat of two weeks ago to Western's Sharon Lane winning the 50 metre hurdles. She won a close 50 metre sprint, and anchored the winning 800 metre relay team.

Another busy competitor was Anne Perkin. To her great surprise she finished second in the 300 metre race. "A couple of weeks ago I finished second in the 300 yards. But this race is a little shorter and I guess that helped," explained Perkins. She also ran a leg of the second place sprint relay team and finished third in the long jump.

With their third place finishes, hurdler Sue Bradley, and 3000 metre runner Joanne Barber, also made a large contribution to the Lady Blues' cause.

After five events, U of T had a ten point margin over Western, with the six-member York team another eight points behind. In the final event, the women made sure that their championship was secure as they finished second in the sprint medley relay, behind McMaster — but ahead of Western.

The final standings were U of T first with 98 points, Western in second with 77, and York in third with 65.

Time's Out For Basketballers After Loss to Laurentian

Doug Fox has been the Blues' top scorer for the last few years.

By JIM O'LEARY

The basketball Blues played a strong second half but it wasn't enough to overcome the powerful Laurentian University Voyageurs in a game played in Sudbury on Saturday. The Blues lost 99-90 to end up in fifth place and out of the playoffs.

Toronto finished the season with five wins and seven losses — behind Ottawa, Carleton, Laurentian and York. Coach John McManus had high expectations at the outset of the season but a combination of two untimely losses and recruiting by some of U of T's rivals dampened these hopes.

The crucial point of the season was the pair of losses Toronto suffered at the hands of Carleton and Ottawa in games played in the capital. If Toronto had taken one of these games they would have made the playoffs.

On Saturday, Laurentian started strong and took a 46-35 lead at the half. U of T did not give up however, and outscored the Voyageurs 54-53 in the second half.

The Blues' resurgence was led by veteran guard Doug Fox. Playing in his last game for the Blues, Fox led the scorers, netting 26 points.

Tim McGhie, also playing his last game, scored 14 points.

Randy Cook ended the season on an individually pleasing note as he grabbed 19 rebounds to win the league's rebounding title for the second year in a row. He finished with 190 rebounds in 12 games and a 15.8 average. His closest rival, Varick Cutler of Laurentian, average only 12.9.

As has been the case all season; Laurentian was led by their three recruits. Bruce Burnett wrapped up the league's scoring title with 35 points. Charlie Wise played his usual dominant game, scoring 24 points while Cutler picked up 22 points.

This performance was enough to place these three in the top four scoring statistics. It is also interesting to note that against Toronto on Saturday they accounted for 82 per cent of Laurentian's scoring.

Despite the loss, McManus felt his team played pretty well. They shot 43 per cent from the floor.

The Blues played well all season against the top competition. It was against their closest rivals that they faltered.

Tim McGhie (42) has anchored the Blues for the last five years.

Queen's Dethroned, Blues Take Crown

By HUGH STUART

U of T's Phil St. Louis had spent much of the gruelling 5000 metres in the middle of the pack. With three laps to go he was fifth. At the bell for the final lap he was a distant third. At the finish line he was first, two tenths of a second ahead of the second place runner from Queen's, and in a personal record time.

U of T performances such as this were the order of the day as the U of T men avenged the loss of their outdoor crown to Queen's and won the OUAA indoor crown. (For women's story, see page 14.)

As expected, the Blues dominated the jumping events. Jumper extraordinaire Steve Cheung, took the long and triple jump. Teammate Algis Jansauskis added second behind Cheung in the long jump.

It was no surprise that U of T won the high jump. However, Rob Pittter was not the pre-event favorite said Pittter. "Our best jumper, Rolo DeMarchi couldn't make it (flu), so it was between me and Steve Dovaston. I really didn't expect Steve to go out so early, so I'm surprised and happy to win." In winning, Pittter set a new meet record. Dovaston placed second.

Tom Worndi and Bob Hart completed U of T's domination of the jumping events with second and third place finishes in the pole vault.

The feature race of most track meets is the 1500 metre race. Saturday's race did no damage to that tradition as it matched two of Canada's premier middle distance runners: Blues' Olympic semi-finalist Paul Craig, and Queen's Bob McCormack.

Craig set a scorching pace for three quarters of the race but McCormack hung on doggedly with the Blues' Terry Goodenough on his shoulder. With two laps to go, Goodenough faded and it became a two-man race. Craig and McCormack were neck and neck for the final laps but McCormack edged ahead at the wire to win and set a new Canadian indoor record. Craig's time was also under the former record, and the hot pace pulled the third place Goodenough to a personal best time.

Stevenson fought his way into third and his performance was sensational in light of the fact that he was one of many Blues who had fought the flu all week (much of the Windsor team spent a sleepless night thanks to the flu).

Three of the top five in the 1000 metres were from Toronto as Lincoln, Goodenough, and Stevenson were second, fourth, and fifth respectively.

After five events, U of T was leading Western by 23 points. After ten, the lead had diminished to nine and a half as the dangerous Queen's team had moved into second.

So, it came down to the relays. Both the 1800 and the distance medley were in heats and luckily (?) U of T was matched with Queen's in sections of both races. The Blues knew that they had to finish ahead of Queen's to ensure the victory.

In the distance relay, Craig took the baton for the anchor leg trailing both Queen's and Waterloo. He quickly passed the Waterloo runner and by two thirds of his eight lap leg he had pulled onto the shoulder of the Queen's man. Craig then opened up a large lead to give U of T some crucial points.

But the U of T 1600 metre team didn't know what the point spread over Queen's was so they were determined to win the race. And win they did. It was a dogfight with Queen's and Western all the way. Lincoln took the baton for the final leg with the other runners hot on his heels. That was as far as they got as Lincoln hung on at the end to give the Blues the victory.

The top three teams were U of T with 156 points, Queen's with 117.5 and Western with 80. Ter-r-rific!

Phil St. Louis gains on the Queen's runner.

Blues Breeze By Rams; Prep For Showdown With Yeomen

By HOWARD DEANE

The Varsity Blues did just as expected and whopped the Ryerson Rams 11-0 in an OUAA hockey playoff at Varsity Arena last Friday night. In other playoff action the York Yeomen beat the Laurentian Voyageurs 8-1, to earn themselves a place in tomorrow's semi-final against the Blues.

Although it was anything but a difficult win, the game did serve a vital purpose. It gave the Blues much needed momentum going into the tougher games of the playoffs.

The Blues' last few games lacked the offensive power they've shown for most of the season. "In the last few games we haven't been scoring. I'm glad to see some scoring," said head coach Tom Watt.

Rob Gemmell commented, "That game's over. We're back on the right track, and we've got it together. If we lose Tuesday, it'll be because they're the better team."

Strong performances against Ryerson were turned in by Captain Larry Hopkins with a hat trick, and Cary Farelli with two goals and three assists.

It was Hopkins' second hat trick of the season. "After I get that second goal in, it's been really tough to get the third one."

The Blues came out flying in the first period, outshooting Ryerson, 25-7, and outscoring them 6-0. Three goals came on power plays.

The Blues converted on three of five power play opportunities, while effectively killing seven penalties of their own.

Three more goals in the second and the Blues were up 9-0. By this time in the game, spectators began to trickle out.

The Blues slowed down considerably in the third, outshooting Ryerson 11-8, but scoring only twice.

Aside from Hopkins and Farelli, goals were netted by Frank Davis, Doug Caines, Ron Harris, Rocci Pagnello, Dan D'Alvise and Dan "Dr. Dunk" Tsubouchi.

All but two players got at least one point, including goalie Dave Jenner. He got his second assist of the year to go along with his second shutout.

This balanced attack is partially due to Watt's quasi-European style of play. He has returned to using five man units, after juggling a variety of players and lines over the past

Pagnello was taken out of the game early in the third period, when he twisted his ankle after being taken into the corner. It is expected that he will be playing in tomorrow night's game against York.

The Ryerson game is soon forgotten as the players and Watt, look forward to the York game. "It's going to be a tough, physical game. They (York) like the small rink and they can't afford to let us go," stated Farelli.

York has won two out of three contests against Toronto, at Varsity this year. "York has had great success in our court — we're not taking anything for granted. I hope we have the place full," said Watt. It is sure to be a physical and tough checking game, as York does not have the skating or shooting ability that Toronto has. They will have to rely on their checkers to have a chance against the Blues.

Hopkins agrees, "We're going to have to play more physical. Our best game is when we're forechecking."

Elimination faces the team which loses this sudden death semi-final game. Plan on being there, tomorrow night at Varsity Arena, 8:00, for what promises to be the game of the season.

Larry Hopkins moves in for one of his three goals.

All-Stars Announced

Much of the reason for the tremendous success of the Hockey Blues this year lies with their first year players. This is reflected in the OUAA all-star teams announced last week.

The Blues placed four players on the Eastern Division team, two of them rookies.

Leading the rookies is right winger Cary Farelli. Farelli came to the Blues with impressive junior credentials, only missing the OHA Junior A all-time scoring record because of a serious knee injury.

Farelli turned down the WHA to come to U of T. He placed second in league scoring behind teammate Doug Caines, with 22 goals and 27 assists in 20 games.

The other Toronto rookie on the all-star squad is Dave Jenner who tied for the goaltending honours. With the loss of last year's outstanding puckstopper Ken Mackenzie, Jenner had big shoes to fill. The burden became even greater after Mark Logan injured an ankle and Jenner was called on to shoulder most of the goaltending duties.

The London Knight and Soo Greyhound veteran responded admirably, posting a 2.65 goals against average.

The other Blues on the all-star team are veteran defencemen Rocci Pagnello and centre Caines.

The "Rock" as Pagnello is known, has combined with Rob Gemmell to give the Blues a potent defensive duo. As well as his solid play in his own end, Pagnello is an offensive threat and often leads rushes deep into enemy territory.

Caines is rebounding from a knee injury which sidelined him for most of last season. This year he has become the nation's most dangerous scorer and has potted 30 goals and 27 assists in 20 games.

Rounding out the squad is York's Dave Chalk on defence and Western's Dave Nadeau on left wing.

Staff, courses, TAs must be cut

By ERIC McMILLAN
Almost every area of the university faces some kind of cutback for next year.

President John Evans introduced the report of the Budget Committee in yesterday's Bulletin by noting "the harmful effects of the budget reductions" created by the government's decreased funding. And that's putting it mildly.

The Budget Committee's report recommends the elimination of faculty and teaching assistant positions, reduction of support staff, elimination of some courses, library cuts, and an assortment of other economy-minded changes. In many cases the committee is leaving specific reductions to the discretion of the particular divisions concerned.

In order to "offset inflation," the committee proposes a six per cent increase in spending for items subject to inflation. The Consumer Price Index is currently rising at 9.5 per cent annually.

The increase in government funding this year is only 5.8 per cent. Moreover, Evans said that with tuitions frozen, the government grant is actually only 4.8 per cent.

The committee asked that the university consider allowing tuitions to rise in proportion to increased costs of education or even at a faster rate.

It also noted that the tuitions in a number of faculties have already been increased for next year. Nursing fees, for example, will rise $45 from this year's $625 level. The largest hike is $60 in Child Studies up to $685.

Arts and Science is the faculty hardest hit by cutbacks. The net decrease in Arts and Science will be almost half a million dollars. The total academic budget will be reduced by two million dollars net.

Arts and Science dean Arthur Kruger said last night that necessary faculty and staff layoffs may be done by not replacing personnel that leave through retirement or resignation. Also some people on limited term appointments may not have their contracts renewed.

"There's no doubt there will be an impact on academic programs," said Kruger. "But this is just another cut coming in a long series."

Courses will likely be eliminated at New College and Innis College, while in other colleges and faculties the decisions are still up in the air.

The budget includes a $9-million increase for salaries and wages. Jean Smith, president of the faculty association which is currently negotiating with the administration, said there is still "a lot of flexibility and room for free play" in the budget in case salaries are raised more than accounted for.

Co-requisites for COM 100

By JOE BOLGER

The Social Sciences Curriculum Committee of the Faculty of Arts and Science decided last Wednesday to establish ECO 100Y and any 100 series MAT course as co-requisites for COM 100Y. This decision, which will be put into effect next September, was passed as a means of limiting enrolment in COM 100Y.

Several members of the committee remarked that they supported the proposal only because they realized that budgetary restraints meant that cuts had to be made somewhere.

Professor Taylor Gilbert of the Department of Political Economy suggested that the flexibility of the Commerce teaching staff (four part-time instructors to every one full-time) may have made it easier to initiate cutbacks in this area.

Donald Guioien, student representative on the curriculum committee, was angered by the decision remarking that "there is no academic justification for these requirements."

At present on the St. George campus 973 students are enrolled in COM 100Y. However just 512 students take COM 100Y in addition to the two co-requisites which will be required next year. This means that 461 or almost half the students taking COM 100Y this year will be ineligible if they apply for the course next year since their program doesn't include ECO 100Y and a 100 series MAT course in addition to COM 100Y.

At Erindale College 215 students out of the 672 enrolled in COM 100Y don't take what will in the future be this course's co-requisites.

Gilbert stated that the cutbacks would "affect those who take Commerce mainly as an outside interest." Because of this, he thought that there would be a "greater effect on Woodsworth than on full-time students."

Arts and Science assistant dean W. D. Foulds remarked that they "don't really know what the effect will be until students enrol." Gilbert warned that the decision could push up enrolment in Economics and Math. If this happens, these courses will suffer the same problem of overcrowding that the Commerce classes are trying to avoid.

If the proposed co-requisites don't help reduce the number of applicants to COM 100Y, the department may limit enrolment on a first-come, first-served basis, Foulds said.

The curriculum committee also put forward a proposal to change the pre-requisites for COM 223H (accounting) from COM 100Y to COM 100Y, ECO 100Y and a 100 series MAT course. This is expected to take effect in the '79-80 academic year.

At the same meeting, the committee approved a new course in the Sociology Department with a projected enrolment of 25 to 30 students. Guioien felt this reflected an unreasonable allocation of resources.

Gilbert also questioned the wisdom of curriculum decisions which divert people "into areas of study where job opportunities are very limited (while) there is still a good demand in the marketplace for people with accounting and commerce backgrounds" — areas for which limited enrolment has been proposed.

As for the permanence of these decisions, Foulds commented that "a good deal will depend on how it works out this year."

It's Radio HR 1099

By RICHARD SMALL

U of T astronomers in collaboration with scientists from the University of British Columbia and the National Research Council (NRC) have made what has been described as a major discovery at the Algonquin Radio Observatory, NRC's national radio astronomy facility at Algonquin Park 250 miles north of Toronto.

Early last week unusually powerful radio waves were detected coming from the star HR 1099 in the constellation Taurus. The star is actually a "binary" system, or one in which the two stars revolve about a common orbital centre. The system is at a distance of 114 light years from the Earth and is barely visible to the naked eye.

Astronomers refer to the system as an RS CVn binary. This means that one of the two stars of the system exhibits a large dark spot on its surface so that its brightness changes as the star rotates, similar to RS Canes Venaticorum, the prime example of this kind of variable star.

What is unusual about the variable star's activity, says Dr. Ernest Seagquist, U of T member of the research team at Algonquin Park, is that the star has been emitting powerful radio waves more than 20 times stronger than usual. Flare-ups like these usually last only a few hours, and take place at long intervals. However, HR 1099 has been flaring daily since last week to intensities never before observed for this type of star. The result is that the net energy output from the star is a hundred times greater than normal.

The activity was spotted during a "routine patrol of a large number of peculiar radio sources," said

Seagquist. Not only is the flare-up "unprecedentedly intense and unusually long," but variations in the strong hydrogen-alpha emission lines have been detected in the star's spectrum at the university's 74-inch telescope in Richmond Hill, added Dorothy Fraquelli, a graduate student in stellar astronomy at U of T.

As a result, observatories all over the world have been notified of the development so they will also be able to monitor the system's radio output. The extent of a world-wide cooperation on the discovery is such that similar cooperation occurs "only once or twice a decade."

"The important thing is that so many astronomers throughout the world are involved" in studying this phenomenon, Seagquist said.

Scientists are still attempting to determine the probable cause of the disturbance. Seagquist and Fraquelli suggested, however, that the "only plausible mechanism" that could cause the increased radio output would be flares on the surface of the variable star — possibly similar to solar flares — which are producing electron streams with velocities near the speed of light. These electrons are then affected by extremely strong magnetic fields between the two stars and are producing powerful radio waves — a process known as "gyrosynchrotron radiation."

Studying these flare-ups is important to the development of an understanding of stars in general. In Seagquist's words, "These (RS CVn) stars are becoming a very important branch of astronomy because they tell us a lot about the processes in relatively young binary stars and about the type of activity that occurs in our sun."

By DEREK WULFF

The U of T men's gymnastic team moved to the forefront of Canadian gymnastics with an impressive second place finish in the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Association (CIAU) finals held in Winnipeg over the weekend.

The team was led by Simon Smith who placed third overall. Smith placed first in vaulting and parallel bars, second on the pommel horse and fourth in the floor exercise, to earn a spot in the finals.

As has been the case for the last few years, York took top team honors with a score of 191. U of T was only 19 points behind at 172, followed by the University of Alberta at 153.

Coach Chester Makischuk was delighted with the team's performance and says that the team is already back in the gym training for next season. "The team is very enthusiastic and wants to close the gap between us and York before next year's Ontario finals," says Makischuk.

Toronto's rise in gymnastics can in part be attributed to the move in practice site from Hart House to the Benson Building, according to Makischuk. In the Benson Building the equipment is permanently set up, supplying better facilities for practice.

The improvement in facilities is apparent in the performances of the gymnasts.

U of T's Derek Wulff also had a good meet earning seventh spot overall, and made the finals in rings and vaulting.

Makischuk himself scored over 40 points in the competition to earn the 13th spot. He reached the finals in vaulting.

The remainder of the U of T squad, Guy Bourbeau and Willie Evans, placed 16th and 17th respectively.

Candidates gamble and reveal their cards

By KATHY CANTY

Election fever is taking hold of the U of T campus. Within a few short weeks the race will begin for positions on Governing Council, the Students' Administrative Council, Hart House committees and the individual college and faculty councils.

On the Governing Council scene, nominations are already closed: 10 candidates contest five student seats. The professional faculties are already filled by acclamation. Richard E. Johnston (Engineering) and Mark Wax (Medicine) are the reps in Constituency II. Anthony J. Usher (School of Graduate Studies) has the seat in Constituency I. In the full-time undergraduate slot (Constituency I) James Hawker has dropped out of the race.

Today The Varsity begins a series of interviews with the candidates for the student seats. Here is what the two competitors for the other Graduate Student seat have to say about their intentions for U of T's top decision-making body:

Buried under a workload of exams and essays, most students at U of T find it hard to understand why anyone would sacrifice their precious free time to run for Governing Council in the upcoming student elections.

Jacqueline Tetroe, however, a PhD student in educational psychology at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE), has a very straightforward reason for wanting to be graduate student representative for Constituency II.

She is running for this position because an administrator in the Graduate Studies office at OISE asked her to, said Tetroe.

Tetroe will be focussing her campaign on OISE students because "to represent them is to represent every part of the university," she said.

"My platform is to try and reflect the needs of the students," Tetroe believes students want more "dignified treatment from the administration." One way of working towards this is to set up more flexible deadlines for course requirements, she said.

Admission requirements are another of her main concerns. Tetroe feels that people should be given credit at university for their work experience as well as their academic background.

Although future students will not be able to receive OSAP after four years of education, the new student assistance program will not affect graduate students very much, said the candidate. Most of them get money from their departments, she added. The Government put this four-year ceiling on the program because too many people were getting into debt, according to Tetroe.

"Cutbacks big issue"

Tetroe's opponent in the upcoming election, David Tennenhouse, however, feels that the new OSAP program discriminates against both graduate students and professional students. "We still have to fight for changes in it," he said.

Cutbacks will be one of the major issues facing the university next year, according to Tennenhouse. To prevent slashes in Library and program budgets the university should consider deficit budgeting on a projected increase in enrolment in the 1980's, he said. The dismissal of tenured staff and the early retirement of professors are two other ways of dealing with cutbacks, he added.

The Macdonald Report, the five year external review of Governing Council, will also have to be strongly resisted by students next year, said the candidate. It reduces the power of student representatives on the committees of the Governing Council and gives far too much power to the president, according to Tennenhouse.

Asked what he plans to do when he finishes his graduate studies in electrical engineering Tennenhouse replied, "I'd like to be an alumna of the university." Tetroe said she would eventually like to work for a school board in a job dealing with applied psychology.

Both candidates have had previous university government experience. Tetroe has been a member of the OISE Institute Assembly, and has acted as chairperson for a Graduate Affairs Committee at the University of Western Ontario. Tennenhouse has been a co-opted member of both the Subcommittee on Curriculum and Standards and the Academic Appeals Board. In addition, he has been the finance commissioner for the students' council and a SAC representative for New College.

Teaching jobs harder to find

By ANDREW RETTIG

Why train to be a teacher when teaching officials tell students there are virtually no jobs awaiting them?

This was the question U of T Faculty of Education (FEUT) students were asking themselves after representatives of the Ontario Teachers Federation (OTF) spoke at the faculty in a recent careers talk.

OTF president James Carey and Beverly Woods, an administrator in the North York Board of Education, told the students approximately 2,500 FEUT graduates didn't find jobs last year.

Woods said that projected jobs for 1978 and 1979 number 2,000 while projected figures for 1980 and 1981 are under 1,000. FEUT turns out approximately 6,000 graduates annually.

The representatives attributed the current teacher employment crisis to inflation and to the decline of the birth rate in the early sixties.

They said that it was not fashionable to have children in this period and that the availability of the birth control pill allowed parents to limit population growth. Canadian parents also realized during this time of slow inflation that children can be very expensive, they said.

Woods said that Canadian population growth in the seventies is nearly zero. She said there are fewer students enrolling at primary and secondary school level, which creates strong possibilities for teacher layoffs in the next decade.

Woods also warned that fewer teachers are retiring early because of the high rate of inflation. Retirement pensions are not pegged to the cost of living. Woods said that a retired teacher with an annual pension of $7,000 is heading for hard times.

Woods said that the high inflation rate is also affecting women teachers. The few who do now have babies, teach during their pregnancy period and return to the profession after giving birth. She said that women teachers state that the high cost of living requires two sources of income in a family.

Eleven nominated so far

By GEORGE COOK

Nominations for positions on the Students' Administrative Council (SAC) close this Friday but so far only eleven people have entered nominations in seven of the 25 constituencies.

So far, no presidential nominations have been received, or any nominations for the Varsity committee.

William Wayne is running in Dentistry, Tom Moore in Forestry, Kate Bishop at Inns, Sheila Kay at Scarborough, Mike Wernick, Peter Jacobs, Steven Finlay and Elaine Lewis at University College, Robert Fairgrieve at Victoria and James Barber at Wycliffe.

SAC vice-president Brian Hill said yesterday that he intends to run for president along with Mark McElwaine from Knox College and Riva Sober, a nursing student.

Hill declined to comment when asked about his election platform. Election regulations limit campaigning until after nominations have closed.

If an insufficient number of nominations is received in any constituency, the eligible candidates are acclaimed and nominations reopened for the remaining positions.

SAC president John Tuzyk said he wasn't disappointed by the small number of nominations. "I think a lot will come in on the last day. It takes a while for people to respond," he said.

Asked about the up-coming SAC elections, student Linda Landry

Mathew Oberc: "I read about it in the Varsity, sorta."

(UC) said, "My feeling is unadulterated apathy. I don't think students feel threatened, so there's no motivation to vote in an election."

"I read about the elections on posters and in The Varsity. This is my second time around at university. The first time I was quite involved in student politics. This time there's a feeling of alienation at U of T," Maureen Mason-Jameson (Inns) commented.

Asked for his observations on the up-coming elections, Rick Festrini (New) remarked, "Well, I know they're hiring people to work at the polling stations. I think they put a lot into The Varsity, but I don't read those sorts of articles. I'm not a politician."

"I know there's supposed to be an election. Usually there's a lot of hype by this time. I tend to think the student council should change their direction. I'm fed up with rallies that don't work," Irene MacPherson, a former SAC rep from University College, said.

The SAC elections will be held March 15 and 16.

Complaint considered but retraction rejected

By ANDREW MAHON

Graduate Students' Union (GSU) vice-president Leo Casey appeared before the Varsity Committee on Monday to present a brief outlining complaints about a story which appeared in February 20 issue of The Varsity.

The story described Grad Post editor Maria Horvath's appearance before members of the Ontario Regional Canadian University Press (ORCUP) two weeks ago where she outlined charges made against her.

In the brief Casey contended that the February 20 story "violates the CUP Code of Ethics." He suggested that the story was not a result of "accurate and impartial journalism."

The brief also contends that "the Varsity editor's article reproduces statements of the Grad Post editor which are unsubstantiated allegations of extreme seriousness in respect to the reputation of the Graduate Students' Union Executive Committee and its officers."

The "requests" outlined in the brief included publishing a front-page retraction of the article, publishing a reply by the GSU, and taking "immediate action to prevent further contravention of journalistic ethics or the Canadian University Press Code of Ethics."

While the committee discussed the content of the brief and the complaints, none of the "requests" were granted. Instead a motion was passed instructing The Varsity editor to have a follow-up story written and to give due consideration to any letter sent by the GSU to The Varsity for publication.

Going to the dogs!

By GEORGE COOK

If you have plans to take your dog to Sid Smith for an afternoon of intellectual enrichment, take care.

Over Christmas a pet owner took his dog into the building and left the poor beast there for the entire vacation, with predictable results.

The building, cleaned on the 23rd of December, was not scheduled for another cleaning until January 3rd. When the cleaning staff arrived and discovered the unseemly matter they were not amused.

Associate Dean of Arts and Science, C. S. Churcher was forced to issue a memo asking pet owners, who currently enjoy the privilege of entering the building with their loved ones, to take care and not let the creatures get out of control.

Dog may be man's best friend, but cleanliness is, after all, next to godliness.

Amelia Scarpelli: "I saw posters up in residence."

Rick Festrini: "I'm no politician."

"Others think we are too soft and generous, and one reader complained that the Sun is 'just another left-wing rag that goes soft on Commies and tries to cash in on government bribes and hand-outs.'"

Toronto Sun

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university.

The Varsity is managed by the Varsity Committee which is responsible for the management, financial policies, and editorial integrity of The Varsity.

An express function of the committee is to receive and consider complaints about the paper. Formal signed complaints — as opposed to letters to the editor — should be addressed to: The Chairman, Varsity Committee, 91 St. George St., Toronto, Ontario.

OFFICIAL CUTBACKS

What can one say about the proposed U of T budget for 1978-79?

We've known about cutbacks for a long time now. The proposed budget simply gives us a catalogue of all the cutbacks that will hit U of T next year. Whereas up to this point cutbacks may have appeared as sporadic incidents the proposed budget makes it clear that no section of the university is going to be left untouched.

We may thank the U of T administration for publishing the budget in time for the cutbacks rally in Queen's Park on March 16. A statement of support could not have been more eloquent than the simple figures just published.

Of course it will take till next year, for students to actually experience the full extent of the cutbacks. Right now we have a proposal to contend with. Next year the budget's figures will have been transformed into everyday reality.

Those who prepared the budget were only doing their job of course. They were translating government funding for the university into a breakdown of university expenditure. Given so much money you can have so many courses, so many professors, so many caretakers and so on. As we pointed out Monday the government's grant to U of T won't even cover salary increases next year, salaries comprising four-fifths of the total budget.

OK so the facts are now complete. It's now up to us to act.

He's a Rebel

It's a pity I did not happen to read the review of Wim Wenders' The American Friend on press night when I dropped by briefly; I would have been able to correct a gross error which mars it, in copy before it appeared, rather than in print as I must now do.

Martial Dylan effusively remarks: "Hopper, who plays the role of Ripley in The American Friend with a ravaged, schizoid intensity, first appeared as the rebel without a cause (directed of course by Nic Ray)."

Now amongst many, many praises that can be richly accorded to Wim Wenders' extraordinary new film is that Dennis Hopper as Ripley looks so much better than he ever has before that it is possible to believe he might be capable of equalling James Dean's magnetic performance in Nicholas Ray's Rebel Without a Cause; but it was Dean, not Hopper, who was the rebel.

This is not a small error, and, even if unintentional, is a disservice to the memory of James Dean, who gave promise before his untimely death of being the greatest actor in American film history. Beyond that, such an obvious error corrodes confidence in a reviewer, and this is too bad, since Mr. Dylan's review is otherwise quite competent, although less generous than I would have been to The American Friend which I think likely to be the best new film that will be seen this year.

Cheers to Marshall Delaney across vales of karma.

Dolphin atrocity

The rounding up and slaughtering of one thousand dolphins by Japanese fishermen is an atrocity of the same proportions — indeed, greater, if a harsh numerical viewpoint is assumed — as those at Sharpeville and My Lai.

The payment of a per capita bounty by the government scarcely adds lustre to this outrage.

The fact, even if true, that these intelligent, conscious, sentient beings had been responsible for a reduction in the fish catch justifies this massacre no more than it would justify, for example, the extermination of one group of fishermen by a rival group.

I trust that sensitive members of the now dominant species will henceforth find Japanese fish products considerably less palatable.

Zionist cynicism

I found in Dan Shufton's lecture on "Arab Strategy" (Wed. Feb. 22) a saddening reminder of the Israeli's tragic feeling of isolation in a world seemingly divided between those who would actively destroy Israel given half a chance and those who don't mind helping that destruction.

I also found in his talk a disturbing note of cynicism — of unwillingness to view the problems of both Israelis and Arabs (especially Palestinians) in human terms. It appears that those Israelis and Zionists who think like Shufton have lost touch with a basic fact of human existence, namely that physical survival must be accompanied by spiritual survival in order to have a meaning.

Least the university community be left with the impression that all Zionists are as cynical as Shufton, I would like to call the reader's attention to an upcoming symposium on the Israeli-Arab conflict to be held March 5 at Holy Blossom Temple (1-6 pm). The "keynote" speaker is Mattityahu Peled who, although he has been an Israeli general, is also able to see the merits of the Palestinian position. I hope he will have the opportunity of responding to intelligent questioning not only from those who agree with him but also from those on his left.

Militants attack Pitman Report

By TOM CODY

Ryerson president Walter Pitman's report on racist attacks in Toronto came under severe criticism Monday during a meeting held at the International Students Centre.

A speaker from the Joint Committee of three defence organizations denounced the Pitman Report as a racist and fascist document opposed to the stand of self-defence. The Joint Committee is composed of members of the East Indian Defense Committee, the West Indian People's Organization and the Canadian People's (Citizens and Residents) Defence Committee.

The speaker said that racist attacks are actively encouraged by the state. He said that activities by the Western Guard, the police and the immigration department are examples of state-organized racist attacks.

He said the Pitman Report cautions against the growing militancy and unity in the East Indian community, states that people should not unite on the basis of self-defence and that people should rely on the state and strengthen the police as a solution to racist attacks.

The speaker said racism is deeply rooted in the state and that the Pitman Report's aim is to attack and undermine the self-defence stand.

He went on to point out that the report painted racist stereotypes of immigrants, did not invite a single self-defence committee to its hearings (although Don Andrews of the Western Guard was invited and heard) and did not interview ordinary people but policemen, social workers, educators and state officials and other professionals.

The speaker concluded that racist attacks will only end when the very nature of the state is changed and not by the solutions of the Pitman Report.

Budget committee proposes severe cuts

By ERIC McMILLAN

Following are the Budget Committee's comments on and recommendations for the effects of its cutbacks proposals:

- Arts and Science, one of the largest sections of the university, will face "very severe" cutbacks. The original proposal would have meant eliminating 30 academic positions and 5 non-academic positions as well as reducing TA, supplies and equipment budgets. Various "add-backs" and budgetary transfers will restore at least a large portion of these losses.

- Some Innis College courses and tutorials will be "discontinued".
- University College will have to do without a College Activities Coordinator.

- The New College library will be hit "sharply" once again. Some courses and music instruction may also be killed.

- Part-time Bachelor of Education courses and teaching assistants will be trimmed.

- Reductions "will undermine the quality of (Scarborough) College's academic program. Several academic and support positions will be discontinued and funding for teaching assistants reduced." A career counsellor will be added as well as a co-ordinator in Public Administration to place students in public agencies.

- Initially-requested reductions would have meant dropping up to a dozen academic positions and as many as seven support staff. Additions and "add-backs" will soften "some of the most damaging effects."

- In order for Continuing Studies to become completely self-supporting, it must reduce its expenses by 3 percent. This may mean ending courses which do not pay their way.

- Graduate Studies may have to eliminate three administrative positions and two cross-appointments. These cuts will cause "serious harm to the quality and levels of service."

- Dentistry's plans to improve services and instruction must be postponed.

- In Medicine the reduction is "large" and "will undoubtedly have an erosive impact on the Faculty's programs, services, and the morale of its staff."

- Nursing will likely reduce its academic staff. Because there is little flexibility in the faculty's programs, the effects will be "severe".

- Pharmacy is one of the few divisions to escape substantial reductions.

- Phys Ed will receive an administrative assistant.

- Engineering is another big loser, especially in the frequency of elective courses and purchase of equipment. "This impact will threaten the breadth and quality of education and scholarship in the Faculty."

- Long-term Faculty of Education programs will not be hurt, although the "variety and depth" of the Bachelor of Education program will be affected and greater pressures will be placed upon staff.

- "The reduction may limit the breadth of the (Forestry and Landscape Architecture) curriculum."

- "One-time-only" expenditures in Architecture will maintain two academic positions until 1979-80 but last year's "one-time-only" expense for other positions will not recur due to retirements. These positions will not be refilled, thus increasing workloads and, possibly, restricting the curriculum.

- Law will face "some erosion" in quality of education and in the level of academic service.

- "Serious" repercussions will take place in Library Science, especially in the doctoral programs and library.

- Music may have to reduce support for the Electronic Music Studio and Thursday Afternoon series, trim equipment spending, and allow staff reductions by attrition.

- Workloads will increase in Social Work through staff attrition.
- The Transitional Year Program faces a 3 percent cut.

This list does not include changes in the budgets for the library system, campus and student services, administration and physical plant.

DJ draws new fans

By CHARLES MEISTER

On Saturday night solid walls of sound reverberate from Roscoe's Pub at New College. Disc Jockey Stephen Fruitman, a second year science student and resident of New College, serves the music up to the drinking and dancing students.

Fruitman says, "Right now New College has a reputation for having a bad pub, but we've attempted to reverse that." The pub was the idea of the New College Student Council and has averaged about 350 persons per night so far. But how does it feel to stand up there for five hours straight? "The most difficult part is that there are so many good-looking girls here that it's hard to restrain myself behind this sound equipment set up. The music also becomes extremely taxing on the nerves by the middle of the evening."

"What I'm doing now," Fruitman says, "grew out of my love for electronic equipment. When friends of mine and I got together for parties I would try to improve the atmosphere by developing some sort of electronic effects such as lighting, and began choosing the records. I can recognize a good dance song. Then I began DJ'ing for high school dances and York University.

Fruitman lived in Israel for three years and points out that there is a far greater European Women's movement takes off!!

By Shane Parkhill

The organized women's movement is on the upswing in Canada, according to Barbara Stewart of the U of T committee helping to plan the upcoming International Women's Day events in Toronto. Stewart and Jacqueline Geering were operating an information table in the foyer of Sid Smith on Monday.

Explaining the history of the women's movement, Stewart said that women workers began holding demonstrations in the first decade of this century and soon began receiving support from the women's suffrage and trade union movements. There was a lull in activity during World War II and the 1950's, but women's events have been taking place again since the mid-sixties.

In Canada, Stewart said, the women's movement has been somewhat "disorganized and dispersed" since International Women's Year (IWY) in 1975, because IWY here was a "Government-sponsored affair" rather than one organized by the women's movement. She criticized the Liberal Government for not carrying out the recommendations of its own Royal Commission on the Status of Women, even in the "grossest areas of discrimination." The Government's sponsorship of IWY "was just for show," she said. "The women got nothing out of it. Nothing at all."

This year, however, there has been a significant increase in the interest in International Women's Day (IWD), said Stewart. An initial group of nine women in Toronto called a meeting last January 12 and 130 women showed up. Sponsors of

Jacqueline Geering explains to a student that the women's movement is not just political, but is a "very strong social movement as well."

IWD now include the Ontario NDP, a number of trade union locals, Ontario Federation of Labor president Cliff Pilkey, Metro Labor Council, the Ontario Federation of Students, the Graduate Students Union executive, SAC Women's Commission and many other individuals and organizations. Stewart added that "women never before active in the women's movement are now among the strongest builders" of IWD.

Because of the oppressed status of women, the present economic crisis "hits them the worst," said Stewart. Women generally lack seniority and are therefore more often laid off than men. She pointed out that women mainly find employment in "ghettoized, female-type jobs—clerical, secretarial, and so on," and that the wage gap between men and women has actually increased in Canada over the last few years.

Stewart also said that the Ontario Government's cutbacks in social services were threatening to close many daycare and rape crisis centres, and that the abortion clinics in a number of Ontario hospitals have been shut down or put on strict quotas, forcing a growing number of women to travel to New York to obtain clinical abortions.

Violence against women is a "definite social reality," added Geering, citing rape and wife-battery as the most blatant examples. She pointed out that Nellie's, a hostel for women who have suffered beatings, is also in financial trouble. She also said that the women's movement is not just political, but is "a very strong social movement as well."

Although March 8 is officially IWD, the march is being scheduled for the following Saturday so that working women can attend, with other events being planned for the afternoon and evening of March 8. Geering said that "having a demonstration is a way of making our demands known, of making people aware of what we're about and hope to achieve."

Students welcome at Drama C

By Leslie Barcza

"It seemed this year that we had to get a message across to the students: that Hart House was there, that they were welcome — and I think it worked."

These are the words of Michael Sidnell, the new Director of the Graduate Centre for the Study of Drama, and effectively the man held responsible for Hart House Theatre in the eyes of the university.

By what he terms a happy coincidence, Sidnell is in a position to know what he is talking about: before being approached about the Directorship, Sidnell had been chosen by a committee to direct the Drama Centre's current production of The Dog Beneath the Skin. The coincidence is happy because Sidnell, the drama centre and the community will find it easier to get acquainted under the circumstances.

Sidnell says "it's useful for me to get to know the theatre side of the drama centre intimately." Not only does Sidnell's production of Dogskin make it possible for him to find out for himself whether or not the "message" mentioned above really did get across, but it (Dogskin) gives us a good look at Sidnell as well: his philosophy can be seen in practice.

Sidnell favors the use of student actors with professionals in the technical departments.

"And by student I mean campus students, not drama centre students. It should be campus wide, and it should be a place where a) students go into the theatre and so on can get a start, but b) pure recreation for students who are going to become . . . chartered accountants: because there is a stage in a person's life when they are creative (writing, performing, and so on) which lasts in a few people, but not in very many. But still you want to use that while it's there."

It's questionable whether many students around the campus realize that the drama centre productions at Hart House are for them; but after the production of Dogskin, many more will probably get the message.

The facets of Dogskin that recommend it for production at Hart House, as Sidnell sees it, are precisely those areas that correspond to the intention stated above. "I suppose it's got a double interest: the play itself is worth revival under any circumstances; it particularly attracts me because of the nature of the play which I think is very appropriate to our setting. If it suggests an idea of what I think of the theatre and what kind of thing we can be doing, that's right." One would assume that the "setting" Sidnell alludes to is ours in the sense of U of T, and not merely stage architecture. Sidnell hints also that Dogskin is close enough to him that the production, or at least the interpretation will have a lot to say about him.

"What I'm particularly interested in is that the play was written for performers who had formed themselves into a group, the acting demands ensemble playing. Those things are particularly valuable. It requires a big cast, which gives lots of people exposure to the stage."

"It's got the right sort of ethos, because it works as a kind of corrective to the greatest vice in the theatre, which I call 'tinsel-professionalism': the imitation of all the outward forms and conventions of the professionals but without six hours a day dedication to training and work."

Dogskin is almost frightening as far as these points go: the happy cast is willing to work, and not just at their specialized tasks. The tightness is especially significant in light of Auden's comments "I Want the Theatre to Be . . .": "every member of the audience should feel like an understudy."

Sidnell appears to share the spirit of that statement by Auden; it has been posted in large type, and in the most prominent place, in the lobby of the theatre. Sidnell's emphasis on participation is not unlike Auden's statement that "drama began as the act of a whole community."

A lot of people do go on from here to become professionals. Sidnell emphasizes that this must be seen in its context: "we're not training them in the way that the National Theatre School, for instance, trains for the professional stage, not in the drama centre, that is. It's much more a matter of opportunities taken by the students themselves and existing talents finding opportunity for development. We do offer a little bit of drama training, but one can't pretend that it's a theatre school."

Consistent with the ideals of his other statements, Sidnell cites the paradox of Hart House Theatre, concerning its setting. "I think it's a student theatre, a recreational theatre — special events in an academic setting. It's a little paradoxical to have a live art in an academic setting, and it's bound to produce some strains and tensions. I think it can be productive under the right sort of conditions; I think often . . . the two things live together with great difficulty. This is true whenever the arts and the academics combine: I think it's true in art schools, theatre schools, and it's probably true in conservatories."

Sidnell spoke of three evils in art, two of which have already been mentioned. (1) "Tinsel-professionalism", that is, externals without content; elements of a production, rather than the whole; (2) Pedantry: the abuse of intellect and scholarship, or rather the disinclination to apply them; and thirdly, the evil that has implications with respect to Dogskin, "petty-politicisation": the tendency for the arts to gravitate — especially, Sidnell says, in this country — towards politics, but away from art. I believe he is implying the tendency for art to become a mouthpiece for one position rather than to operate on an ideological level.

At first glance, The Dog Beneath the Skin may appear to be guilty of that third evil, at least in the published version (in which the heroes go off to join the communist party). The version that Auden and Isherwood revised for the first stage production in 1936 was different not only because of their growing disillusionment, but also because of the weaknesses of the old ending.

Dogskin is ideological without committing the sin Sidnell

The Centre spreads

Michael Sidnell is the new director of the Drama Centre.

Michael Sidnell is the fourth director in the Drama Centre's twelve-year history, succeeding Clifford Leech (a founder who was 'active director' for one year), Brian Parker (1967-72), and Anne Saddlemeyer (1972-77). He had previously served as academic secretary for the centre, 1972-74, and had taken the spring, 1975, term as acting director.

The Centre's offices are housed in darkest Massey, and the few staff are bolstered by involved advisors from many other disciplines. The activities, like the personnel, are not tightly and formally interconnected; through a maze of funding, a substantial library is maintained, a quality theatre quarterly edited, and the Canadian Theatre History Research Project thrives atop Robarts.

In 1966-67, its first year of operation, the Centre had fourteen graduate students and two courses, supplemented by those courses taught in other departments. Ten years later, the students numbered 76 and the courses twenty. An evaluation of that growth pointed out the commitment to "permit a limited number of practical courses without jeopardizing the liberal arts emphasis" which the Centre wishes to maintain in its students.

Accordingly, its students are expected to be involved in all aspects of the theatre — often on the stages of Hart House and the Glen Morris Studio Theatre. On the main stage, about four productions a year are selected by a staff-student committee, while as many as a dozen plays will reach the Studio's smaller space. It is here, according to Sidnell, that student work is to be played, where "more experimental productions . . . be done economically". And casting is not, of course limited to the Centre's students.

described. For one thing, it combines political satire that leaves no side untouched (although there is an unmistakable bias to it), in a context that is eclectic, drawing from mummies plays, Victorian melodrama, morality and mystery plays, and music hall reviews. A marriage of the surreal approach of Monty Python (in 1935, remember) to a social conscience, the tone of the play must be experienced to be properly understood.

Spoken choruses by the two "witnesses" separate the scenes; music is prominent in the show, indeed right in the middle of the stage, where the bandstand is. When I suggested to Sidnell that his approach and indeed the play seemed Brechtian, he replied that such terminology was not fair to the authors who were making their discoveries at about the same time as Brecht. As Sidnell suggested, this play seems to represent a renaissance in British drama (that's how Brecht saw it), along with other works by the Group Theatre, for whom the work was written.

From our perspective, it was ahead of its time, and now that we are able to see it away from the politics of the time, is clearly come of age. Rather than calling the people of pre-war Britain to attentiveness, it sounds now rather like a political Pilgrim's Progress.

When asked about the balance between the narrative plot concerning Alan Norman (normal or no man?) and the episodes, Sidnell admitted that this was a danger in the script. Alan is, in Sidnell's words "both a peg to hang a philosophy on, and a character who is going to interest the audience. That vying between on the one hand, the narrative interest, and on the other, the satirical, review, parodic description of the world: these two things have to be very carefully balanced."

Judging by a rehearsal last week, the tone should take care of itself, at least in terms of the audience's attention. Rod Taylor (who with Gordon Woodbury wrote the original score for the production) remarked after that rehearsal that he was considerably less worried than he had been about the heaviness of the show, because a little girl who had been in the audience had giggled all the way through at the cute dog on stage. The net effect (I concur with this little girl) is indescribable; try looking at the picture of Mark Balgrave in his "sweat suit".

The role played by Woodbury and Taylor is one that Sidnell expanded on, after smiling broadly. "I think that's a very special thing about this production: that is, you always have an author (or in this case, authors) to be grateful to, but in this case, it's very special that we have music written for this production. It is local in that sense, and that's an important feature of it for me."

Sidnell believes that with live musicians, the audience should see the players, rather than having the music rise mysteriously from the pit or out of the wings. As a result of this conviction, and in contrast to the Group Theatre production, for example (which had an orchestra pit), the band is placed prominently on stage.

"I think it's in keeping with the style of the play, that is, we're not making any illusion with the setting, the costumes, etc."

Sidnell also uses the band in the context of the tight company that he spoke of as part of his philosophy. Each member of the band (with one exception, who joined late in the rehearsal period) appears in a stage role at least once. As the director saw it, "we haven't taken that quite as far as I should've done, but enough to make the stylistic point." The isolation that the band might have experienced from the play was broken: in two scenes, the bandstand is incorporated into the action.

The approach to set construction brings home to the casual observer the greatest of the theatre's difficulties and challenges. Half the set is in place seven days before the opening, yet the rest is under construction on the stage. There is a small amount of workshop space backstage, but not enough for the larger pieces. Despite talk about financial difficulties the greatest problem in this theatre is logistical.

Sidnell, in discussing the situation, sounded like he was trying to be kind about a situation that is preventing the theatre from fulfilling its full potential. "It's a nice theatre with respect to being a nice auditorium and stage, but it's a hopelessly set-up theatre with respect to backstage and working facilities. We haven't got a proper workshop, we haven't got a proper wardrobe space, we haven't got the kind of backstage facilities that every theatre now has." Referring to the sounds of construction that were coming in the dressing-room door (relatively speaking, the room was quiet), Sidnell responded with the sort of defense that a meticulous homemaker offers when renovations are under way. "So you can see that we have all the sawing and cutting going on, on the stage, which is a very bad practice. It's very bad for the fabric of the building, and it's a tremendous waste of stage time." From the way he said that, you realize that the director prefers to rehearse plays on the stage being used at that moment as a carpentry workshop; to quote the play, "Fancy that now!"

Can one reconcile the principles of participation, the "spirit of amateurism", recreation, play, and the standards of excellence that are the end of the students' efforts? "Play" and "recreation" imply that the production might turn in on itself, since its purpose would not go beyond what the participants get out of it.

It is the director's job to make sure that the theatre is not what Sidnell calls a "sandbox": in other words, he must ensure that the participants work toward a goal. He has concerned himself with making sure that this is an extroverted production.

Sidnell, as I understand, has been a quiet, pleasant man to the cast throughout the rehearsals; at a recent, post-run-through rehearsal of curtain-calls one might say that the spirit of recreation temporarily overcame the spirit of participation in a collective endeavour. Sidnell was brief, still relatively quiet, but stern in a manner that the cast had not heard before. "Do you want to rehearse? If so, we'll continue." An embarrassed silence followed. Essentially, Sidnell took the play impulse and steered it outward, instead of letting it get lost behind the foolights.

The Dog Beneath the Skin previews tonight, opens tomorrow, and runs until March 11. Curtain time is 8:30.

Alan is accosted in the Red Light District.

... but how you play the game

Liberals in Rosedale.)

Note: The text consists of actual quotes from a February 27 article in the Globe and Mail. Any resemblance to characters living or

Dramatis Personae:

Ann Cools, a candidate
Mr. Bob Logan, Chairman of the party's Ontario Workshop.

Scene:

The shady confines of the Chateau Laurier Hotel. The clinking of glasses, and Liberals in elegant evening wear. Hopeful candidates are busy kissing hands and shaking babies. Bob walks over to Ann and kisses her on the cheek.

Bob: ... I have to support John. I think you're a good candidate, but I think John is (sigh) better ...

(Ann touches his sleeve fondly ...
Bob turns away and continues.)

... you've earned a lot of respect in the party, but we want John in Rosedale. He's the man for the riding. He can carry it. (He turns to her) ... we don't think you can.

(Ann brushes a tear away while the band plays "Don't it make my brown eyes blue". Bob clears his throat and continues.)

... we suggest that you stay in the race for a couple of weeks ...
(pause) ... then drop out gracefully.
(Bob places his hand on her shoulder.)

... the party will take good care of you ... (looking into her eyes) you know that (his voice trails off).

Ann: "No, I'm not going to drop out.
(She removes his hand brusquely.) I was the first person to declare my intentions to run in Rosedale. (Her eyes flash wildly.) Why didn't you tell me a year ago that you wanted
John Evans to run?"

Bob: (carelessly) Why don't you find another riding in Metro?

Ann: It's too late for that. (Turns suddenly to Bob) Why doesn't John Evans find another riding? I personally don't think he's the right man for Rosedale. I'm going to stay and fight. I'm a fighter and I want the people not the backroom boys (gestures vaguely around the room) to decide who's going to win.

Bob (mumbling something about the "best" thing) disappears behind the cocktail bar.

Ann: (Alone. Turns to the audience)
Why, oh why are these men so afraid of me? They're making a mockery of the democratic system. If they believed in democracy, they would let John Evans stand up and fight on his own two feet.

influence on that country's music. They have a "much higher tolerance for songs in any language," he says. He found Israeli youth to be very fun-loving. "I guess it arises from living so intensely, thus creating a need for a release which they find through social interaction."

He is very excited about a new project on campus called Radio Varsity which will resume broadcasting after a two-year absence. Fruitman will have a disco music show on the station.
He further reveals "the best thing about Radio Varsity is that we're starting a disc jockey service using the station's library."

Thinking about the hazards of his job he observes, "The crowd has a tendency to become obnoxious when they're drunk and some guys try to dictate what kind of music I should play. But I believe a disc jockey should be in control at all times. Most college students prefer music they can dance to at the pubs. The silent majority wants disco oriented music while a vocal minority insists upon old rock and roll."

Fruitman complains, "Most other pubs on campus are usually too small or the disc jockey is too impersonal. But that's not the case at Roscoe's. I'm always willing to take requests. It's a combination of good music and good people that makes a pub successful. I don't consider this a job," he laughs, "but more as an opportunity to create a situation where people can have a good time."

Exile says foreigners to blame for repression

By MAUREEN ROACH

Political repression is an everyday experience in Latin America, political activist Hugo Blanco reports.

Blanco, whose death sentence by the Peruvian Government was eventually waived through international solidarity, and who is now living in exile in Sweden, discussed the links between foreign interests and political repression at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education Friday.

Latin America is owned by the United States, Canada and Japan, he stated. Totally void of interests in the countries in which they invest, these three countries pay "starvation salaries" to Latin American employees. He said agriculture is neglected and inflation is skyrocketing (in Sao Paulo it is 5,000 per cent).

To conceal unfavorable effects foreign investors formulate myths, Blanco said.

"There is the myth of development. Since I was young I have been trying to find what is development and I did find it. Our foreign debts have developed to $40-billion over 10 years. The misery of our people has developed too. In Buenos Aires, the mortality rate is 30 per cent over the past five years.

"The imperialists like to say they are sending us money as a gift. But they do not tell you that for every dollar they send $9 is taken out in profits or used to suppress our people."

Canada is the second largest investor in some Latin American countries, Blanco stated.

Blanco noted that in all these countries investments increase with government repression. He cited the aftermath of the Chilean coup, where three Canadian banks loaned the revolutionary government $125-million to pay off European creditors. Canada's Noranda Mines has invested $1-billion since the coup, he said.

"People think Latin Americans are crude and brutal when they hear of the hundreds of thousands killed in political strife," Blanco continued. He emphasized, however, that the troops used to suppress political dissidents are trained in America and the arms are sent from "civilized" countries.

The foreigners, he said, advise democracy and peaceful means to change the system, but the slightest hint of dissatisfaction elicits reprisals from the local ruling class in conjunction with the foreign investors.

Blanco pointed to the political hypocrisy on the part of the Canadian Government which sent two Members of Parliament to investigate the violation of human rights in Chile and made other denunciations of the Pinochet Government. At the same time, however, it refuses to name the Canadian companies that invest in Chile.

Art: more than what meets the eye

By CAROLYN CLINK

Visual Arts Week at St. Michael's College uses displays, workshops and seminars to bring art to the student, according to the program co-ordinators. Most of the activities take place in Brennan Hall on St. Mike's campus. All activities are open to the public but pre-registration is preferable because of limited facilities.

On Monday, participants in a workshop on Super 8 cameras took the participants down Yonge Street and into the world of the zoom lens. At the calligraphy workshop there were approximately 10 people practicing the techniques of handwriting.

Tuesday saw a return of calligraphy and a workshop in cartooning, darkroom techniques and printmaking. Today workshops will be held in video taping, mono-printing and life drawing. Finishing the day is a live taping of the Gene Taylor Show at 7 p.m.

Thursday offers an exciting culmination to the workshops, with Chinese brush painting, seminars on photo journalism and sculpting. There is a student film screening of competitive entries and an edited version of the Super 8 films made during the workshop at Carr Hall. An open studio has been set up for anyone to try their hand at all the printmaking media.

Thursday evening Larry Dane, producer and star of "Rituals," will be speaking after a screening of the film. Director Budge Crawley, who is also responsible for "The Man Who Skied Down Everest," will discuss his film "Janis."

Visual Arts Week ends in a wine and cheese party in the Brennan Hall students lounge on Friday.

Rally at Queen's Park? You decide.

Are you going to put yourself in the picture?

*CUTBACKS

The funds available to the post-secondary system for next year have just been announced. They do not come close to meeting the effects of inflation, according to even the government's own advisory body. This will mean even larger classes, fewer tutorials, further reductions in library service and higher academic incidental fees. Aging equipment will rarely be replaced, course offerings will become further restricted.

*UNEMPLOYMENT

Student proposals for expanded summer job creation, and requests for action with respect to the employment situation facing graduating students, have not received a positive government response.

*WHAT DO WE DO?

In light of these developments, University of Toronto students must now consider their future course of action. Students at York, Ryerson and Glendon have decided that the only alternative left to them is a rally at Queen's Park to show opposition to government policy. SAC has recommended to its membership that University of Toronto students endorse this action and participate in it.

But the final decision is up to you. The meeting on March 6th would allow for discussion of our response to the government, and will decide whether or not U of T students will endorse the rally at Queen's Park and work towards its success.

*STUDENT AID

Since the new student aid proposals were announced, students have negotiated with the government to make necessary improvements, those negotiations involved meetings with the Minister, Dr. Parrott, Lobby Day and culminated with the recent OFS meeting with the Cabinet. The government refuses to budge on limiting eligibility for grants, thus cutting 20% of those currently receiving grant assistance, and making graduate and professional schools accessible only to those that can afford them. As well, Dr. Parrott has refused to make public the parental contribution table, although he admits it is prepared. Could this be because the expected parental contribution will be even more unrealistic than it is now?

Olympics Or Bust For Three U of T Hockey Stars

By ANDREW MAHON

Donna Allaby, Jean Gourlay and Glynis Peters are three U of T students who are actively preparing for a world championship.

The sport is women's field hockey and Gourlay and Allaby have already been selected for Canada's National squad which is preparing for the 1979 world cup in British Columbia.

Peters is one of 45 hopefuls selected to attend a camp which will supply 15 more players to the National squad.

All three players are preparing for the upcoming season with an extensive indoor training program which includes weight training, stick work and distance running.

Glynis Peters

"There's a big push on right now," according to Peters who plays left-wing and is also a third year French student. "The Canadian women's field hockey team is currently ranked 13th in the world. — It has to make the top ten in order to qualify for the 1980 Olympics."

Gourlay and Allaby began playing field hockey in high school, before coming to U of T. Gourlay who plays full-back, has been playing for the provincial team for 4 years and Allaby, an inside right-half, has played provincial for five. Both Allaby and Gourlay are phys-ed majors.

Peters, who is a relative neophyte to field hockey, began playing during her first year of University. She has played for one year on the provincial team.

The strategy used in field hockey is basically derived from soccer. There are eleven members on each team and scoring can only occur

Ravens Foil Lady Blues' Stab At Fencing Title

The Ontario Women's Intercollegiate Athletic Association (OWIAA) fencing finals were held at McMaster this weekend with the University of Toronto being represented by Alice Chan (Capt.), Lily Dobay, Debbie Frankish, Sue Langley and Sub, Charleen Howatt. In a last minute shuffle at Saturday's team meet, U. of T. had to fence the Carleton Ravens, their toughest competition, early in the day instead of closer to the end as had been expected. After an exhausting match the score was tied 8-8 and the judges turned to the "indicators" (the number of hits each team received). The result was unbelievably close, giving Carleton the edge by only two hits. The rest of the day went smoothly for U. of T., but as no other team came close to defeating the Ottawa girls, the Lady Blues had to settle for second place.

The individual meet on Sunday was made up of the top eight fencers from each of the three provincial sections. U. of T., Carleton and Western dominated the field, as the first two had a full representation of four each and the last of three members. All of the Toronto fencers made the semi-final level where Frankish and Langley were eliminated. Dobay and Chan then went on to place first and third respectively. Dobay, who had fenced a nationally ranked fencer last year and ended second, faced the same challenge this year, but from Karen Bergenstein (Carleton), who she first tied then defeated in a sudden-death bout.

The final results for the 1977-78 season:
OWIAA Champs — Carleton; Second — U. of T.; Third — U.W.O.
OWIAA Individual Champ — Lily Dobay (U. of T.); Second — Karen Bergenstein (Carleton); Third — Alice Chan (U. of T.).

from within a striking zone. There is no body contact and only two substitutions for the duration of the game.

According to Peters, women's field hockey generally differs from the men's game. "It's not a finesse game for the men, at least not as much as for the women," says Peters, "and the men's game tends to be more physical."

Women's field hockey is beginning to become more popular, especially in other parts of Canada.

"If you're in B.C., it's like ice-hockey," explains Allaby, "it's also growing rapidly in the Maritimes."

But the U of T team has also been improving. According to Allaby, a lot of success can be directly attributed to the coaching of Liz Hoffman. "She's preparing us very well," says Allaby, "she seems to have a sense of timing for peaking."

While Hoffman herself is pleased that Gourlay and Allaby have already made the National Squad, she is hoping that Peters will also be added to the roster. "When you do your next story, I hope I can say that there are three women from U of T on the National Squad."

Yeomen's Demise Sends Toronto To Finals

JIM O'LEARY

About 4,000 people jammed Varsity Arena last night expecting to see a close-checking, low-scoring hockey game. Instead they were treated to a wide open affair as the U of T Blues downed the York Yeomen, 8-6, to advance to the Ontario University Athletic Association final against Laurier.

The previous meetings between these two teams had been low scoring affairs. York doesn't have the firepower of the Blues so they normally use a tight checking style, tying up Toronto and waiting for the opportunities to present themselves.

"I sure didn't expect that many goals," said U of T coach Tom Watt after the game. "York usually plays it pretty tight."

According to Watt the Blues' strategy was to move the puck quickly out of their own end and try to take an early lead.

"We wanted to shoot out," said Watt. We also didn't want them to take the lead. The games they won against us we let them get ahead."

Watt's strategy didn't seem to be working in the early going as York capitalized off a face-off to take a 1-0 lead in the second minute of the first period.

"I was a little worried when they got that first goal," said Watt.

The first goal also worried goalie Dave Jenner. "After they got that early one we had to bounce back in the next three or four minutes or we'd have been in trouble. If they had scored the next goal they would have gone into that defensive shell of theirs."

The Blues did as Jenner had hoped.

Led by the strong work of centre Dan D'Alvise and linemates Cary Farelli and Larry Hopkins, the Blues stormed back scoring three goals before the end of the first period.

The goals went to D'Alvise, Doug Herridge and Doug Caines.

York narrowed the count to 3-2 in the second but the Blues bounced back to score two more before the end of the period to take a 5-2 lead.

The Yeomen were forced to open up in the third period which produced end-to-end action and lots of goals. It took the Blues only 45 seconds to get on the scoreboard with a goal by Hopkins. Farelli upped the count to 7-5 with the first of his two goals before the Yeomen came to life. In the last seven minutes they counted three goals.

"That was a wild third period," said Jenner. "But you kind of expect things to open up when you get a three or four goal lead."

The York goals came after Toronto miscues in their own end. Watt didn't think the Blues were careless however. On the contrary he felt they were playing too cautiously.

"We tried to be too careful. Instead of getting the puck out we ended up giving it away," observed Watt.

"You've got to give York credit though. Even though they fell behind, they made it a good hockey game right till the end," he added.

D'Alvise was the spark-plug of the Blues' offence with a goal and four assists.

The Blues meet Laurier in the first game of a best-of-three series at Varsity Arena Friday night.

Cary Farelli (6) and Larry Hopkins (9) combined with Dan D'Alvise to score five goals against goalie Steve Bosco.

Preobrazenski Takes Fourth

By ANGELLO CALLEGARI

U of T wrestler Jack Preobrazenski placed fourth in the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union wrestling finals held at Royal Military College last weekend.

Preobrazenski earned a spot in the national finals as a result of his first place finish in the 177 pound category at the Ontario finals the previous weekend. He was the only U of T wrestler competing at R.M.C.

Preobrazenski started strong, pinning his first two opponents. It took him only two rounds to subdue Bill Kakroner from the University of New Brunswick in his first fight. In the second it took three rounds to pin Paul Kose of McGill.

His next three matches were much tougher. He lost to Clark Davis of Lakehead (bronze medalist in the World Junior Championship), Craig Delahunt of the University of British Columbia and Grant Hughton of Western in a close 8-12 decision.

The meet had representation from Ontario, Quebec, the Maritimes and Western Canada. The strong teams are a sign that Canadian wrestling is making a move towards developing some top international athletes.

Highly favoured to retain first place was the Ontario A team. Ontario is considered to be the Canadian centre for wrestling as was evidenced by the fact that it was the only region to send two teams to the national final.

As expected, the OUAA (A) team took top team honours followed in order by the CUWAA, QUAA, GPAC, OUAA (B) and the AUAA.

The next tournament for Toronto's wrestlers will be the Ontario Senior Wrestling Championship to be held at York's Tait MacKenzie Building this weekend.

NOTE: Our apologies to U of T wrestler George Multamaki who was inadvertently left out of last week's report of the OUAA championship. Multamaki wrestled very well to take third place in the 150 pound class.

Boxers Bop Brockport

By ALLEE

An appreciative crowd of partisan fight fans drowned out the snap-snap-shuffle of the ring action as U of T boxers earned a draw at Brockport University, New York, last weekend.

Collegiate champ Jason Lo dazzled a heavier Brockport fighter in a non-decision exhibition to start the show. At the end of the evening, members of the audience came to ringside to congratulate Toronto coach Tony Canzano on the consistently skillful boxing of his team.

Convincing wins were scored by Toronto's Ralph Janzen and Steve Way. Way, showing his experience, controlled his fight from the first bell with a long jab and a short overhand right. The finely conditioned Janzen simply overwhelmed a slower boxer with his quick flurries and fast footwork.

Chia Lin Wang and Richard Wright gained draws. Wang relentlessly crowded a taller opponent to score with his patented double-barrelled hook. Veteran Wright racked up enough points in the early going to gain the tie despite a tough last round in a rough and tumble crowd pleaser.

Elie Kivity and Mark (fighting Irish) Shea lost decisions against more experienced boxers. Shea, in his first fight, demonstrated sound basic boxing skills in a gutsy tussle with the student coach of the Brockport squad. Kivity scored well with hard punches against a nimble and elusive opponent in a bout that ringsiders thought could have gone either way.

Brockport will be coming to Toronto for a return bout on March 10 in preparation for the eastern collegiate finals in late March.

Olympics For Blues?

By JIM O'LEARY

According to a report released last Friday by the Olympic Committee of Hockey Canada, Canada's ice hockey team for the 1980 Lake Placid Olympics could be made up largely of University players.

One hundred twenty players from junior, university and other amateur teams will be involved in an Olympic program. From these, Canada's entry for Lake Placid will be selected.

The selection of players will be based on "technical skill, physical fitness, emotional control, discipline and total commitment. Only those players who satisfy all criteria at all times will be invited to be part of the team," the report says.

Special care will be taken to ensure a team which combines sportsmanship with ability. Hockey Canada wants to avoid repetition of the 1977 World Championships in which the Canadian entry exhibited "behaviour which is absolutely unacceptable in such a competition."

The program is comprised of five phases.

- January 1978 to May 1978. The organization and planning of the program will be completed. This phase will include planning the summer program, informing all eligible players of the criteria for summer camp eligibility, planning of exhibition games for the coming season and contacting potential financial supporters.

- June 1978 to August 1978. This phase will deal mainly with evaluation of potential players.

- September 1978 to May 1979. In these months player selection and preparation for the Olympics will begin. This phase will include exhibition matches against NHL, WHA, European and top Canadian Amateur teams.

- June 1979 to February 1980. This phase includes the final preparation (i.e. selection of players, exhibition games and scouting of opposition) and the Olympic competition at Lake Placid.

- March 1980 to May 1980. These months will be taken up with evaluation of the entire Olympic Hockey program and recommendations for the establishment of such a program on a permanent basis.

Hockey Canada Chairman, Douglas Fisher, sees this as a new means to develop hockey in Canada. But sees money as a possible stumbling block.

"It requires a lot of money to be raised. At present Hockey Canada is only getting 2 per cent of the 25 million dollars allotted by the Federal government for sports," said Fisher.

The report outlines a number of potential sources of revenue for the program. Hockey Canada, Game Plan, Hockey Equipment Sponsors, the Canadian Olympic Association and revenue from exhibition games are all seen as means of financing.

Fisher also points out that the program is dependent on the support of amateur hockey. Junior hockey could pose as a stumbling block according to Hockey Canada officials.

According to Georges Lariviere, the man responsible for the Olympic Committee report, it's too early to say whether Junior Hockey will support the program. "We have not spoken to them as yet," he reports.

Profs back Mar. 16

By KATHY CANTY

U of T faculty will be joining in the mass protest against cutbacks scheduled for March 16.

A proposal to support the demonstration on Queen's Park was endorsed on behalf of the U of T Faculty Association (UTFA) at a meeting Wednesday by the association's executive.

The faculty of both Ryerson and York have already decided to join the campaign. The York Board of Senate has voted to close the university the day of the demonstration.

According to UTFA President Jean Smith there was a consensus of feeling at the meeting that the "university has been remiss in not taking part earlier in dramatizing underfunding." Faculty members felt that more of this should be done, he said.

Also discussed at the meeting were the salary and benefits negotiated between UTFA and Simcoe Hall. According to Smith, the faculty is extremely upset that the administration has decided to reject the proposals put forward by Queen's University professor Dan Soberman, the mediator between the two parties.

Faculty members from both the extreme right and the extreme left on the question of bargaining have denounced the position of the administration as it appeared in the U of T Bulletin, said Smith.

UTFA is disappointed that Soberman offered the faculty only a 3.75 per cent salary increase, but it is prepared to accept his proposals, he said. The administration must reconsider its position, added Smith.

It may be an encouraging sign that no one signed the administration's statement of its position in the Bulletin last Tuesday, said Smith. "It is easier to back off from something no one is identified with."

The final decision on the negotiations rests with Governing Council, according to Smith. If it rejects the recommendations of the mediator, however, there will be a "crisis of confidence" which will go to the heart of the university.

"Many of my colleagues now believe that they are insufficiently protected by the Memorandum of Understanding," Smith said. The memorandum is a collective bargaining agreement negotiated between the faculty and the administration last year.

Trent sit-in closes classes

By GEORGE COOK

Seven Trent University students who occupied the office of the comptroller yesterday morning have forced the administration to agree to a cancellation of classes on March 16, the day of the Queen's Park anti-cutbacks rally.

At 8:30 the students entered the offices of Trent's comptroller. The seven told the three staff people present that there was a fire in the building and asked them to leave in an orderly fashion.

When the staff members complied, the students moved in.

The students made seven demands on the acting president of the university, Marion Frye.

The demands included a five-year freeze on tuition and ancillary fees, a university-wide moratorium on classes on March 16 to allow Trent students to participate in the Queen's Park rally, the immediate withdrawal of the February 26 deadline for payment of tuition fees, and four other demands relating specifically to Trent.

At a meeting of the Trent Senate yesterday afternoon, the demand for a cancellation of classes on March 16 was agreed to.

The seven met with Marion Frye and the vice-president of business affairs, John Leishman, late yesterday evening to discuss the outstanding demands.

"The best I can say is that the sit-in is still sitting in. The only non-contentious issue is the moratorium on classes for the sixteenth," Roger Gillespie said.

At the meeting Frye told the seven students of the senate's decision to cancel classes for the Queen's Park demonstration.

According to Gillespie Frye has claimed that she is in no position to negotiate on behalf of the university.

"One of the things still unresolved is the matter of whether or not the university will get someone to negotiate," Gillespie said.

Asked to describe the atmosphere at the meeting with Frye and Leishman, Gillespie said it was "friendly and antagonistic, depending on the point of contention. Both sides were tired."

The students planned to stay in the office over night.

Frye could not be contacted for comment. Leishman's residence was contacted but he would not come to the phone.

Noreen Byers (Sociology III), Roger Gillespie (Politics II), Ben Henderson (English II), Lisa Layton (Politics II), David Nicol (Classics II), Lee Shropshire (English II) and Jerry Turner (Sociology III) are the students involved. Gillespie is a former president of the Ryerson student union.

Byers said, "Trent is in a position that it could be closed down by the government tomorrow. We wanted to get people's attention, internally and externally. We wanted to let people know what's happening at Trent in terms of cutbacks and what the trend is provincially."

The seven hung a sign in the window of the comptroller's office urging students to go to the afternoon Senate meeting. Estimates of the numbers of students who attended range from 60 to 150.

Asked how long they plan to remain in the comptroller's office, Nicol said, "Until the points mentioned — the demands — have been agreed to."

The seven have appealed to students at other universities for support.

According to a spokesman at the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS), 25 universities have been contacted and all have sent telegrams of support to the Trent Seven.

U of T's Students' Administrative Council (SAC) has sent a telegram reading: "Support your efforts — see you March 16th."

Louis Prue, external commissioner for the Trent Student Union (TSU), said the occupation has generated a lot of interest. "Reaction ranges from a lot of support to none. It all happened very quickly," he remarked.

TSU didn't hear of the occupation until an hour after it had begun. They met later in the day, according to Prue, and affirmed their support for the March 16 moratorium.

Later in the day TSU circulated several hundred copies of a brief containing information about provincial cutbacks in university spending.

They agreed to support the seven in principle, but have reserved judgement on the other demands.

"We're going to take a good look at their demands and write a policy report on them later today," Prue said late yesterday afternoon.

The students are "a group of activists with no particular connection to any particular political group," Prue added.

TSU is planning a support rally for today.

Lower standards imminent

By PETER HOHENADEL

A recently released report prepared by a U of T committee anticipates that the university will lower standards of admission for Grade 13 graduates to the Faculty of Arts and Science on the St. George campus.

The committee, headed by Trinity College registrar David Neelands, based its recommendations on a growing trend of declining enrolment that has resulted in a drop of 7.2 per cent in the number of Grade 13 applicants who accepted offers to enroll at the downtown campus since 1972.

The report noted that the single most important factor contributing to this declining enrolment is the growing number of university dropouts. According to the report, the number of degree students who were classified as full-time has dropped by seven per cent. This figure includes students who have elected to continue their studies on a part-time basis.

The report estimates that the arts and science faculty at the St. George campus "will have to increase its offers of admission . . . by some 22-39 per cent." It warned that the resultant increase in enrolment on the St. George campus will have a detrimental effect on the ability of Scarborough and Erindale Colleges and other universities to fill their admission quotas.

When questioned about the implications of the report, William Kent, Director of Admissions for the St. George campus, stressed that the report is only a study paper. However, he said that if the trend towards declining enrolment continues, a decline in admission standards is imminent.

Kent explained that admission standards are decided by supply and demand, and that lowered admission standards are a reflection of the declining demand for a university education. He pointed out that admission requirements for the St. George campus are still the highest in the province.

Traditionally, admission requirements for U of T have risen steadily throughout the years, according to Kent. He speculated that the inflation of high school marks will make the St. George campus accessible to even more students than anticipated.

Gudrun Curri, registrar at Scarborough College, said that even though admission requirements have been steadily going up in the past few years, the actual grades of U of T students have been falling. (The report stated that the average mark has dropped from 72 per cent to 68 per cent in the last four years.) She concluded that there is no obvious connection between admission requirements and a

Scar candidates stress finance, efficiency

By NICK MAROTTA

Scarborough College Student Council (SCSC) elections are revolving around the issues of finances, improvements in facilities and the need to have a smooth functioning Council, according to the candidates in the race.

Pat Price (Com. III) of the Price, Randy Magnus, and Jan Hodgson ticket feels that his slate is well qualified to address the problem of finances. Price, the presidential hopeful, hopes to remedy this situation with a two-fold program. One measure that he hopes to implement is the increase in the promotion of pub nights and dances which would bring an increased revenue. He wants to place part of the college's allotted funds in a term deposit, thereby reaping interest and making the funds more readily available.

Magnus, (COM III) the vice-presidential candidate on the ticket, proposes to improve the position of the Scarborough College newspaper, Balcony Square. Magnus proposes that the Balcony Square staff be allowed to adopt a constitution which would prevent the newspaper from being used as a political instrument.

The Price, Magnus, Hodgson slate faces opposition from the Pitter and McKee team. Pat Pitter is the hopeful aspirant for the position of president on this ticket. Pitter is a third year political science student. Among Pitter's aims is the improvement of communication between Scarborough College Student Council and the media within the College. Pitters would appoint representatives within the council who would be responsible directly to council. Another measure that Pitter hopes to implement is the creation of an SCSC notice board which would inform the students of the working of council.

Pitter's running mate is Shird McKee who shares his running mate's interest in making SCSC run more smoothly. McKee expressed a desire to work with capable and dedicated commissioners. If the commissioners are negligent in their duties, McKee expressed the opinion that impeachment proceedings could be initiated.

(Arts and Sci III) is running as an independent. Waithe believes that one of his essential responsibilities will be in the area of co-ordination. He wants to make the council run more smoothly by implementing procedures for the efficiency of the council's commissioners. Waithe proposes to achieve this by holding monthly meetings and by having the council commissioners draw up constitutions and guidelines for smoother operations.

Sheldon Leith, a fourth year student, is running as an independent for the position of president. Leith believes he can ameliorate the financial position of the college. He says that income from the games room can be used to increase services where they are most needed. Another aim of Leith is to have the college aid students in their search for employment.

The dark horse candidate is a student who goes by the name of "Insecto." Insecto is running for SCSC president as an independent. His aim is to establish an "organic sovereign" if elected.

Students: No wage hike

By SHANE PARKHILL

The Ontario Ministry of Labour announced recently that minimum wages will be going up soon. However, two categories of employees, students and those who serve liquor, are being excluded from this increase.

On August 1, the general minimum wage will rise to $2.85 an hour from its present level of $2.65 an hour. It will be increased again to $3.00 an hour, effective January 1, 1979. The hourly minimum wage for construction workers, presently $2.90 an hour, will rise to $3.15 on August 1 and to $3.25 next January.

For those who serve liquor directly to customers, the minimum wage will remain at $2.50 an hour. The Ministry takes the position that workers in this category receive "substantial additional income" through gratuities.

The hourly minimum wage for students of $2.15 will also be staying the same in the hope of increasing student job opportunities. The student category applies to those under 18 years of age who work no more than 28 hours per week during the school term or more than 44 hours per week in the summer months.

The Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) has a standing policy of opposing both minimum wage differentials, according to OFS researcher Dale Martin. "We don't think there's any evidence of a relationship between the number of people employed and the minimum wage," he said. Martin felt that the number of people working in the restaurant industry was determined by the amount of business it received. "Lowering the minimum wage just puts more money in the pockets of restaurateurs rather than motivating them to hire more people," he stated. Martin also said that a lower student wage does not significantly decrease unemployment among those under 18.

Even if you get one of these jobs, don't expect more than minimum wage.

Governing Council candidates

By REGINA HICKL-SZABO

The heat goes on in the Governing Council race. Today The Varsity talks with the candidates for the two seats in the part-time Constituency 1:

Joseph Garten

"I definitely oppose the Macdonald Report" says Joseph Garten, one of two candidates running for the position of part-time, undergraduate representative on Governing Council.

Garten sees the report as a regression to the 60's, when students had little or no voice in matters concerning university government. "If the Macdonald Report is accepted, the percentage of student vote on the Council would drop from the present 15 per cent to 11 per cent," states Garten. "This would be its largest effect."

This candidate sees the new structure of curriculum as being one of next year's most relevant issues. Since Erindale College has accepted a new structured program for Arts and Science students, as well as a mandatory English proficiency test, the Faculty of Arts and Science will certainly discuss its relevance on the St. George Campus next year, said Garten.

"But I would have to be convinced before I accepted the recommendation, that it would propose an academic program demonstrably superior to the one we have now," he stated.

"I see the Campus as Campus Centre being necessary," said Garten. He went on to say that U of T falls behind "any other university in the country" in that it lacks facilities. "I would push for it," added Garten.

Garten is unsure how the council will deal with provincial cutbacks in the next year. "Cutbacks could affect tertiary staff," he said, "but the Council hasn't decided anything yet."

Garten ran for a seat on the Toronto Board of Education in 1976, and plans to run again this fall. He says he definitely has a political career in mind for the future. "Like to serve the public," he concluded.

SANDRA JOLLEY:

Sandra Jolley, a candidate for part-time undergraduate representative for Governing Council, states that the Macdonald Report has "most horrendous implications for students." Changes in the structure of the Governing Council, proposed by Macdonald, will make faculty membership a majority, she explained. "No one group deserves so much attention," said Jolley, "and this is just Macdonald's effort to pacify a disgruntled faculty."

Jolley says she will be more aggressive in reaching her goals, than she has been in the past should she be elected. "I am not easily intimidated," she said. The candidate added that she would also make clear her own interests before accepting a seat on a committee, in order to be a most effective voice on the council.

Jolley at present occupies one of two seats allotted to the part-time constituency on the Governing Council.

Jolley stated that the Macdonald Report will probably be one of the most pressing issues to be dealt with in the next two or three years by the council. Another very important issue will be university cutbacks. More specifically, Jolley, said that the university's administration will be fighting for more benefits, as will the faculty.

Jolley openly declared that the Governing Council would probably ignore the whole question of the Campus Centre. "I think plans of a Campus Centre are exciting," she said, "but they are simply not seen as a priority, except by students." Jolley predicts discussion and negotiation regarding the Centre will continue for another two or three years.

On the topic of provincial cutbacks, Jolley simply stated: "We will try to live with them."

Though she is hesitant about a future in politics, Jolley admits she has entertained these thoughts. She says she has been involved in every federal, provincial and municipal election since 1970, in one capacity or another.

Gremlins

In a story entitled "Teaching jobs harder to find," (Mar. 1), the statement "students (were told) approximately 2,500 FEUT graduates didn't find jobs last year" should be "2,500 graduates of teachers colleges (in Ontario) didn't find jobs." The statement "FEUT turns out approximately 6,000 graduates annually" should read "Ontario teachers colleges turn out approximately 6,000 graduates annually."

Superstars in sports: Goons or Gods?

By JEFF BUCKSTEIN

"The star system in North American sport has debased in character those ideals which should be sought for. It is a cancerous philosophical approach to sports," charged George Ferzoco of St. Michael's College in moving a motion "That the Star System has corrupted North American Sport." The debate at Hart House Wednesday had a small but enthusiastic audience of 25.

Ferzoco added that there are "a select few" in sport that the public idolizes, "some for their lack of skill, such as Edward Shack" ("Clear the Track!" came a shout from the audience), "David Schultz" (left-winger for the Pittsburgh Penguins) whose Philadelphia Flyers fan club was billed as (Schultz's Army—complete with First World War German army helmets), "and Alex Karras" whom Ferzoco quoted as saying "I hated everyone on the football field. I had a licence to kill for 60 minutes a week... and in the end, I had no regrets."

Ferzoco said he had a coach in high school, who "when things got rough would issue two orders: KILL! and DOUBLE KILL!! Now that is a most philosophical approach," he added sarcastically.

Hugh Reid of Victoria College, speaking against the motion, said that the true spirit of sportsmanship still exists today in pro sports.

"Part of sportsmanship is the desire to win. Linemen have to be rough in football. To beat the opponent, they can't say 'Excuse me sir, but as a scholar and a gentleman, would you let me through the line to tackle your quarterback?'"

"As far as Alex Karras is concerned, we all know how serious he is. As a commentator with Dandy Don and Cosell on Monday night football, one must take his remarks with a grain of salt."

Robert Howse of Trinity College, speaking for the motion, claimed that "there was a time, not too long ago, when one could be a sportsman, a gentleman and a scholar all at the same time. The notion of gentlemanly sportsmanship has been destroyed."

He quoted hockey player Derek Sanderson as saying that when he's not playing well, he'll pick a fight in the third period. Then if Sanderson is still playing poorly, at least he can console himself with the thought that he won the fight.

Speaking against the motion, Lawrence Kelly of St. Mike's College said that Shack and Schultz have never been referred to as stars in the "true sense" of the word. "Whoever said that Shack or Schultz were stars? Have they ever been voted to an all-star team? The only complimentary remark Schultz ever got was to be called a goon or an animal."

"That is a compliment nowadays" came a comment from the floor.

Kelly pointed out that "in any activity, two groups (of good and bad elements) will be found." He cited quarterback Roger Staubach of the Super Bowl champion Dallas Cowboys who is a member of the Christian organization "Athletes-in-Action."

In the debate from the floor Geoffrey Burger of St. Mike's College charged that television has had a negative influence on sports.

"With the merchandising and force-feeding of pro sports, we have brought sports to prime time with Schlitz."

Burger claimed that children suffer the most from the influence of television in that they try to be "Superstars" instead of playing the game for fun. He concluded his remarks by referring to the opposition as "Joe Garagiola Tech" and ended with a motto which he felt should be followed in sport today, but isn't: "All gentlemen can't be athletes, but all athletes can be gentlemen."

Michael McCulloch of Victoria College said, "We don't go out to sporting events to watch individual excellence. Fans are nothing but a bunch of Romans screaming for blood."

Peter Neilson of the Faculty of Law immediately jumped up and yelled "I can't let him get away with that." He argued that "competition is essential to the nature of the human being."

Guest speaker Frank Cosentino, Chairman and Director of the Department of Physical Education and Recreation at York University, said that athletics "means competition for a prize—and the prize is victory."

"In sports, when the odds are against you, you keep trying and prepare to do your best. Sport is a competition, first, of people against people, then people against the elements and finally people against themselves."

Cosentino said that "people have to have something to reach out to" and that sports stars exude one of the "beauties missing in society. They peck away at limits, and in that way they are creative. Sport is capable of giving goals to the athlete."

The motion was narrowly defeated by 13 votes to 12.

EXCELLENCE VS MONEY

Something is rotten in the state of U of T enrolment policy. Judging from much of the policy put forward recently, this university will be a bastion of excellence over the next few years.

We have the New New Program to prevent Erindale students from getting their degrees taking bird courses only, and proficiency tests to make sure U of T students aren't illiterate. To take Commerce 100 students must now have two co-requisites. All of these measures will reduce enrolment. But that doesn't matter, we just want the very best, don't we.

Well, not according to a report leaked by the Globe and Mail, Wednesday. It seems that because of declining enrolment U of T will have to lower admission standards to the Faculty of Arts and Science at the downtown campus. And if this happens at the St. George campus, you can be sure the same will happen at Erindale. With funding based on enrolment the university has to maintain a steady influx of students.

So the money issue has somewhat diminished the high purposes of this institution.

By lowering admission standards U of T will try to entice students from all over the province. It will of course, draw students away from their local institutions. But who's worried about those places? We're living in an age of cutbacks. And U of T has to take care of itself. Right?

Anti-Arab racism

I would like to register publicly my disapproval of the propaganda that Masada has been printing in recent issues.

Anyone familiar with Masada is already likely to know that this magazine, even at its best, is an embarrassment to our university. But its two latest issues are so much worse than that as to require special comment.

The first of these contains an article entitled "Chimera in the Middle East", by R. Emmett Tyrrell, Jr. Tyrrell tries to convince us that perpetual antagonism is inevitable in the Middle East because of what he conceives to be the incorrigible perverseness of the Arabs. To "prove" his point he sets out to malign every aspect of Arab life that he can think of, including the Islamic faith, for which he reserves his most venomous remarks.

Needless to say, Tyrrell provides no evidence for his views. His ignorance of the Arabs is total, and his purpose in any event is not to promote understanding, but to prevent it. I do this piece no injustice by comparing it with the literature of the most rabid white power groups. It is so unmitigated an example of hate literature that it must be seen to be believed, and anyone concerned about growing racism in Toronto would do well to read it for himself.

Equally offensive is the most recent Masada, containing the article "Human Rights in the Middle East: An examination of slavery in the Arab World". Its authors apparently hope to discredit the Arabs by branding them indiscriminately as slave-traders and brothel-keepers. Unlike the Tyrrell article, this one is equipped with a number of authentic-looking footnotes which might seduce the unwary into taking its accuracy for granted.

Anyone who checks these notes, however — and I encourage everyone to do so — will be rewarded by a clearer understanding of the kind of work that passes for "research" at Masada. The careful reader will find, for example, that some of these references do not exist. He will find that others have been altered or taken out of context so as to misrepresent the sources from which they are drawn. He will further note that some of these sources are outdated or of doubtful reliability. And he will certainly wonder where the authors unearthed such publications as the Ghanaian Weekly Spectator and The Malawi Times, both unavailable in our otherwise well-stocked library.

I have no wish to minimize the abomination of slavery where it can be proven to exist, but I believe that it should be examined in a responsible manner. The Masada article is not responsible. It is shoddy work, and all the more objectionable because it seeks to incite hatred against an entire people by cheap and sensational propagandizing.

Articles such as these two from Masada should not appear at our campus. Those who are concerned about reducing racial tension in this city will do that cause a service if they succeed in persuading the Masada people to refrain from such defamation in the future.

Joint committee errors

I wish to comment on the Joint Committee's opinions concerning racism in Toronto, as stated in the Varsity (Monday, Feb. 27, 1978).

Typifying extreme left-wing strategy, the Joint Committee chooses to indulge in inflammatory rhetoric rather than logical analysis. Let me examine some of the statements made by the Joint Committee.

It speaks of "agents of the state in the immigrant communities... being employed to escalate the police activity against the East Indian and West Indian communities". Who are these "agents" you may ask? The Joint Committee does not enlighten us. I suspect that these so-called "agents" are in fact non-existent bogymen conjured up out of thin air to further the Joint Committee's fanciful notions about the causes of racist attacks.

As proof of state involvement in racist activities we are told that "the RCMP led and financed the fascist 'Western Guard'". In fact the RCMP infiltrated the Western Guard to secure incriminating evidence against its leadership. The recent conviction of Don Andrews is testimony to this point.

It is claimed that the Pitman Report "tells immigrant communities 'that they should not defend themselves' — when attacked by racists." This is a total distortion of the Pitman Report, which rejects the formation of vigilante defence groups as a solution to racist attacks. By inference it is obvious that the Joint Committee supports the formation of such groups. This position runs counter to the very ideals of tolerance and justice presumably espoused by the Joint Committee, since these groups would soon degenerate into roving mobs seeking revenge at the expense of innocent whites. In a different context, this position would undoubtedly be applauded by the KKK.

We live in one of the most cosmopolitan cities in the world, in a province and nation which not only accept, but encourage the expression of non-Canadian cultures. I remind the Joint Committee that this is Canada, not Uganda — most citizens abhor racism. Is violent confrontation really the best policy?

I do not suggest Toronto is a Shangri-la where all men are brothers. Racism is a fact of life in human society — we are all prejudiced to some extent (holier-than-thou members of the Joint Committee please take note).

The inflammatory rhetoric served up by the Joint Committee only serves to further divide Torontonians. By blaming the state for racist attacks, the Joint Committee obscures the true cause of racism — ignorance. The ultimate solution will be found only through enlightenment and reason.

Erin pub manager

I must first commend your paper and reporter, Peter Hohenadel, for the conscientious effort made on behalf of Paul Linklater, ex-Erindale pub manager. However, in the interests of accurate journalism, and since CFRE-Radio Erindale supplied a certain amount of information to your reporter, a few items should be clarified.

First, your article stated the girl caught somewhere on campus with a beer was carrying an "American" beer. It appears that this is not the case and that the girl was drinking a Canadian beer. This perhaps indicates an amount of taste.

Secondly, concerning the $1,000 amount to hire a replacement for Mr. Linklater, it should be noted that Chris Shortt, Finance Director of ECSU, made this statement. It was not Rob Mowat, President, as you have stated in your article.

While these two points might seem trivial in regard to the other possible mistakes by ECSU outlined in the article, these errors should be noted.

There are still many questions left unanswered in this affair in light of ECSU's conduct throughout the year. The recent cancellation of Erindale College's winter carnival sponsored by ECSU is only a small example. After gaining sponsorship from Carling-O'Keefe and advertising diminutively in the campus media, ECSU attempts to blame the failure of this annual event on the lack of student interest. This seems odd when one considers that most of the students did not even hear about the upcoming event. Further, ECSU recently opening nominations for next year's student government, the candidates were given less than a week to enter their names. Again, it is doubtful if the students even know of the upcoming elections given the small amount of publicity allotted to them by ECSU.

CFRE will aid the Varsity in their investigations into these and other issues in any way possible. Once again, thank you for your continuing cooperation and concern.

With nominations closing today at noon, a total of 36 candidates have been nominated for positions on the Students' Administrative Council (SAC). At this time elections are certain at St. Mike's, University College, Trinity, St. Hilda's and Innis.

As well, one presidential slate has filed its papers. Tom Simpson of Engineering is running for SAC President on a slate with David Beaton of New College and Robert Mowat of Erindale. SAC vice-president Brian Hill has announced his intention of being a candidate for the presidential spot with running mates Mark McElwain of U.C. and Reva Sober of Nursing. As well, SAC scuttlebutt rumors of the re-appearance of a Capitalist Club slate which contested the election last year.

In a unique development, a total of four student society presidents have entered the race. In addition to Rob Mowat, Jane Bowiby (St. Hilda's), Gary Elliott (New) and Joseph Lstiburek (Engineering) have been nominated.

Other candidates nominated since Wednesday include Brian Hudd and Peter Wolf (Engineering), Carl Symondson (Law), Alex Yeung (Innis), Dawn Renfrew, Stephen Fruitman and Connie Kristiansen (New), Henry Lotin and Bruce MacLellan (Scarborough), Sue Kelley, Julia Greczylo, Stephen Quinn, Brian O'Riordan, Tony Cuisimano and Gus Cuisimano (St. Mike's), Lesley Watson, Gary Yee, Fred Myers and Phil DeGroot (U.C.), Alexandra Bezeredi (St. Hilda's), and Richard Small and Tony Saunders (Trinity).

Student council President John Tuzyk said that "lowering the admission requirements is dealing with the symptom and not with the cause." He stated that the issue of admission requirements is secondary to the reasons students are electing not to come to university or dropping out after one or two years of study.

Tuzyk said that higher tuition fees, dismal employment prospects and uncertainty over the new student aid program are all important causes of declining enrolment. He said that although the Ontario Council of University Affairs (OCUA) had predicted an increase in enrolment, university enrolment is continuing its decline. Tuzyk attributed this to OCUA's reliance on demographic trends, which ignore the uncertain future of a university education.

Perspectives: un député parle

Les relations entre les Québécois francophones et les Québécois anglophones ont beaucoup amélioré dans les mois derniers, a affirmé Pierre de Bellefeuille, député des affaires culturelles du gouvernement péquiste, à une conférence lundi sur "L'Actualité politique Québécoise."

Malgré que ces relations "étaient très tendues c'est presque un euphémisme," il se trouve maintenant au Québec un nouvel climat de coopération, a-t-il dit. Le discours faisait partie de la semaine Québécoise organisée par le département de français.

De Bellefeuille a parlé en détail des programmes révélés par le gouvernement Québécois dans le discours inaugural fait récemment dans l'Assemblée Nationale. Il a dit qu'un des premiers buts du gouvernement en 1978 est "une amélioration des droits de la personne" particulièrement en ce qui concerne le rôle de l'homme comme travailleur et consommateur. Il a promis que le gouvernement introduira des règlements permettant les "class actions" contre les producteurs et aussi de nouvelles lois gouvernant les relations propriétaires-locataires.

La protection de la santé des travailleurs — "un de nos principaux engagements électoraux" — sera également sujet de la législation nouvelle. De Bellefeuille a révélé qu'à cause du "militantisme des femmes au sein du parti Québécois," qui ont promis de mettre les péquistes "hors d'office" à l'élection prochaine si on ne s'accorde pas à leurs demandes, il y aura une révision des règlements concernant le congé de maternité.

En discutant les activités de la Gendarmerie Royale Canadienne (GRC), quelque chose qui "nous préoccupe beaucoup," de Bellefeuille a accusé la GRC d'avoir essayé "(d')aggraver le climat" politique de la province. Selon lui, la GRC a commis "des atteintes aux droits de la personne, des atteintes aux droits civils."

A une question de l'assistance concernant la situation du gouvernement péquiste au spectre politique, a-t-il répondu que c'est un gouvernement du "centre-gauche" ou "social-démocrate." Pendant que les autres gouvernements nord-américains mettent "la pédale douce aux mesures socio-économiques... nous continuons nos engagements," a-t-il ajouté. En discutant la décision du gouvernement d'exproprier l'industrie de l'amiante et d'en faire une "Société Nationale de l'Amiante," il a dit que leurs ennemis leur ont flétri socialiste, quelque chose qui ne lui faisait pas grand sens parce que "la mainmise va se faire d'une manière pas très socialiste... un achat."

De Bellefeuille a aussi rejeté l'hypothèse que l'incertitude politique qu'Quebec causera une fuite du capital. S'il y a une "fuite massive de sièges-social ce serait grave," a-t-il répondu, mais "ça n'a pas atteint des proportions importantes."

Au sujet de la participation de Michel Tremblay dans la semaine Québécoise, il a dit "le jeu est un français régional qui est à mon avis la langue nationale des Québécois." Comme conclusion a-t-il remarqué les problèmes des canadiens-français hors de Québec. "Les minorités francophones dans les autres provinces tournent vers nous de plus en plus — et de plus en plus nous pourrions leur offrir de l'aide... (mais) s'ils ne sont pas convenables ou ils sont, bien, ils peuvent venir chez nous."

Levesque plan impossible federal advisor tells forum

By PAUL F. ROONEY
The Parti Quebecois (PQ) is trying to fool all of the people all of the time. That was the message of an Erindale College forum on Wednesday evening entitled "Quebec: Sovereignty and Economic Association."

Keynote speaker Professor Don Smiley, an advisor to the federal Committee on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, explained the three options that exist for the present jurisdictional set-up in Quebec: complete sovereignty for Quebec, a revised federalism with special status for Quebec, or political sovereignty with the retention of a formal economic association with the rest of Canada.

The third option is being touted as a solution by Quebec Premier Rene Levesque, but according to Smiley, "it is both undesirable and impossible. There exists no constitutional procedure for arranging such an association between a province and the federal government; it could only be arranged after Quebec had obtained complete independence. Thus any choice of sovereignty by the Quebecois on a referendum must necessarily be made without the surety of any special economic association."

Smiley set out what he felt were the four economic characteristics and the economic requirements for a federal Canada. He cited equalization — that the federal authority act to reduce regional economic disparity, often at the expense of one or more provinces. The second was economic integration — economic policy common to all the country. The third, structural integration, is free movement of commodities throughout the country. He said the fourth was to present a single face internationally. Quebec sovereignty would be at counter-purposes with all of these requirements, Smiley concluded.

LEVESQUE'S ACTIONS

Quebec as a separate political entity would not contribute to any equalization, Smiley said. Its own economic interests would preclude it from following a common Canadian economic policy. The nature of its economy at present would likewise preclude any free movement of commodities, he said.

The actions of the Levesque government have already shown that presenting a single face internationally is simply ludicrous, Smiley stated. Thus any economic association between Quebec and Canada just is not feasible, he argued.

The PQ has made no attempt to define what they mean by "economic association." According to Desmond Morton, "economic association is just a phrase calculated to give Quebecers the assurance to vote for separation in a referendum."

Smiley said that if the Quebecois believe in economic association and vote for separation, only afterwards will they learn that it is impossible. According to Smiley, "the separation question is likely to be resolved emotionally rather than rationally."

Ask Procter & Gamble
what you can do with your BA degree!
You could become the advertising / marketing manager for one of these P&G products!

Although only 5 are shown here, Procter & Gamble makes more than 30 well-known, well-advertised consumer brands.

For each brand, there is a small management group, usually just 3 people, totally responsible for planning, creating and supervising everything that is done to increase consumer acceptance of their brand.

The group is headed by a Brand Manager, an important level of management in our company.

Right now, we're looking for a few highly qualified Spring graduates with the potential to become Brand Managers.

You would start in our Toronto General Offices as part of a brand group for a specific brand, perhaps one of those shown here. To help you learn quickly, your Brand Manager would give you challenging assignments of increasing responsibility in various key marketing areas such as package design, special promotions, budget planning and analysis, and market research.

The emphasis would be on you, your ideas, your ability to contribute. You'll be promoted on the basis of merit alone. It's not uncommon to become a full Brand Manager within 3 years.

Since you will begin to manage from the day you join us, we're looking for "take charge" people with outstanding records of leadership while in university. "Superior academic achievement", "innovative", "a record of being able to get things done", and "good oral and written communications skills" are some of the words we use to describe the people we want.

If this kind of work interests you, find out more about us at your Placement Office. If you think you qualify, please send me your resume, including a recap of your achievements to date.

Ubu resurrected in Paris: Peter Brook on the move

"Merdre" is the first word in Peter Brook's latest production at the theatre "Bouffes du Nord" in Paris. It is an adaptation of Alfred Jarry's Ubu plays, originally written in 1888. "Merdre", translated by some as "Pschitt", becomes for Brook the central image and metaphor for the play. Even the theatre building is the embodiment of this same sentiment.

The Bouffes-du-Nord theatre, home of some of Peter Brook's recent Paris productions, is an extraordinary run-down shell of a building that feels and looks like a bombed-out citadel. The walls are peeling in great chunks of aging plaster, and actors can poke their heads through ragged holes around the stage area. "Merdre" describes accurately one's first impressions on entering Brook's theatre. But what is a director like Brook doing in this strange environment? Brook has directed films such as Lord of the Flies, Marat-Sade, Lear, The Beggar's Opera, amongst others. He has worked with various famous theatre companies, including the Royal Shakespeare Company at Stratford, England. But from the RSC and others he has moved to Paris, away from the large-budget and prestigious theatres.

In France, Brook is head of the International Centre of Theatre Research, which Jean-Louis Barrault, then controller of the Theatre des Nations in Paris, had first invited him to establish at the end of the sixties. The Centre is made up of actors from different countries, France, U.S.A., England, Japan. It is dedicated to exploring new possibilities of theatrical presentation. They are searching for alternatives to western theatre performance as we know it.

Recently Brook has directed a version of Shakespeare's Timon of Athens and a work called Ik. Having once toured Africa, playing Shakespeare to small tribes who could not understand English, Brook offered us Ik, a production that would speak to us with sound and rhythm as well as words. As he believed the African audiences could respond to Shakespeare, so too did he try to transcend the limitations of language for a western audience.

BROOK'S EXPERIMENTAL CAREER

Earlier, Brook experimented with parallel work at the RSC where he had worked on a project known as the 'Theatre of Cruelty'. Then, in 1964, Brook had explored the theories of Antonin Artaud who had advocated immediacy and violent intensity of theatrical expression. The stress was, as in Brook's later work, on non-verbal communication: the physical became the dominant feature of performance and rehearsal. Ultimately, this work led to the production and film of Marat-Sade.

This experimental work has come from the man who has also astounded audiences with his Shakespearean productions, always trying to create new approaches, never resting with old clichés and conventions. Brook directed King Lear (1962) and Midsummer Night's Dream (1970). Both productions were landmarks in the history of the RSC and, in a wider context, all of modern Shakespearean production.

This is only some of Brook's work in the past 15 years, but from those origins the Ubu production clearly emerges. It is the most recent part of Brook's experiments in an alternative theatre. In his book The Empty Space Brook expresses how the traditional theatre must be replaced by a new, vital theatre that is not dependent on box-office to survive. The "deadly theatre" of the establishment must be torn down. In the document outlining the aims of the International Centre of Theatre Research, it says that the actors must work in "conditions that are new and free". The production of Ubu at the Bouffes-du-Nord allows this freedom. The company is subsidized, admission is cheap (15F) and the theatre is devoid of set and machinery — an empty space. The audience is close by the actors and all ideas of the "professional", polished production can be ignored. The crumbling unobscured building, and the relaxed, informal intimacy between actor and audience seem appropriate for the aims of Brook and the Centre.

The choice of play itself is equally appropriate. Jarry conceived the play at the age of 15, when he was taught by a Monsieur Hebert. Together with a friend, Jarry created all manner of grotesque and degrading situations that M. Hebert would enter into as King of Poland. Later, their sketch became a marionette play. Then, the full play Ubu Roi emerged, and two other Ubu plays were added. At its premiere, December 10th, 1896, a scene of chaos took place, not on stage but in the audience. The pro and anti-Ubu factions fought and yelled at one another with considerable violence. The critics continued in a parallel vein over the following days, and Ubu was a landmark in modern French theatre. The attraction for Brook is obvious.

ABSURD TYRANNY

The main concern of the Ubu plays is to tell the tale of the absurd rise to fame of a tyrant. Ubu laughs and bullies his way to becoming King of Poland. Then, carried away by megalomaniac obsessions, he orders mass executions of politicians, judges and ordinary people. The horror is, however, secondary to his hilarious antics. In the second part of Brook's version, based mainly on Ubu Enchained, Ubu is deposed; he leaves Poland and wanders across France attempting to adjust to his new position of servility; but being Ubu, he finds it difficult. Finally, he is imprisoned and tortured. From his place in prison, however, Ubu proves that imprisonment is more desirable than freedom; at least, the freedom that all those around him have.

This absurd, funny and vicious play immediately attracted Brook, who had spent many years exploring humour and violence. In this production the comic was stressed heavily. The absurd comedy of Ubu and Mere Ubu in their rise and fall from power was presented as though the actors were in a perverse, yet recognizable circus. The actors, with Ubu (Andreas Katsulas) as the master clown at the centre, performed a ritual study of absurdity, playing through one comic routine after another. The only set, apart from a few hand props, consisted of two giant, wooden cotton-reels, such as might be found lying around in a warehouse. Apart from these, the actors had only a bare stage, a few bricks which represented banquet food, brick walls, weapons and other things, and four trap doors in the floor. There was no attempt at technical support. All the play was in bright white Brechtian light (the audience too was lit) and the only extra sound apart from the actors' voices was simple percussion played by a drummer on stage. The costumes were simple and tattered, suggesting no particular time and place, although some of Ubu's cronies looked like Polish versions of the French Resistance.

The acting style was obvious ham: mock grand gesture and exaggerated expression. The humour was played to its full as the play unwound, and cunningly hidden under those comic layers the moments of cruelty crept in. An enormous Ma Ubu ensures the loyalty of Ubu's followers by stepping on their hands; Ubu jokes and laughs hysterically as he pushes countless numbers of men down a trap-door to their deaths. These elements of the comic-grotesque develop as the play moves breathlessly on. The theatre of cruelty lingers ominously in the background as Ubu enacts a war-dance as he murders a crowd of peasants. Brook uses dance and mime to emphasize and explore the non-verbal emotions of his characters. The first half ends when Ubu, protected by massive rubber padding, is defeated by his own image in a mirror.

The second half shows even more clearly how Brook has blended Artaud and Brecht to produce drama that moves rapidly from the intimate to the alien. As Ubu tries to be a normal working man, ordered about ruthlessly by a Napoleonic-looking figure, the audience laughs, but it watches from afar. However, as the characters begin their feast on stage, the audience is once again close in with the cast, as water and banana-skins land in their laps.

Ubu is triumphant to the end. When on trial he confesses all and demands the worst possible punishment. Like Brook, who moves from the extreme violence of one play to the absurd comedy of another, Ubu is a man who knows only extremes. Ubu prefers slavery, because freedom is too simple. Brook prefers the rough theatre of the Bouffes-du-Nord to the RSC, although he is returning to the RSC for a production of Anthony and Cleopatra this summer.

At the end the audience, generally very young, is left with a smile as the actors take their bow. But all is not over yet. The audience are perhaps too close to Ubu. After the play, the cast gathers on stage to sing Ubu-esque songs, in an overly Brechtian style. The songs re-tell Ubu's story, strongly characterized by the word "merdre".

It is a strange production at the Bouffes-du-Nord, frustratingly undergraduate at times, avoiding professionalism and at times infuriatingly messy. But that is exactly what Brook wants and an audience is challenged to accept the production on his terms. It is difficult not to be attracted by such irresistible humour, energy and intelligence, although occasionally I'm sure I heard one or two people mutter words under their breath (when they were not laughing) that sounded like "merdre".

THESIS

by: Rallo Gozniak

To trace and assess by empirical extrapolation the initial penetration, rapid rise and ultimate predominance of the German and Japanese "small car empires" within the contextual parameters of the North American marketplace, based on their innate and ongoing superiority in all facets of automotive functionalism.

Mr. Gozniak:

Like so many of your peers in the undergraduate ranks you are afflicted with an extreme case of "cognitive dissonance". This is a psychosomatically induced condition wherein a prevalent attitude has no rational basis other than an illusory advantage accepted and wildly blown out of proportion, e.g. that foreign-made small cars are superior in every respect.

It behooves me to make you aware of the effects of this insidious disease on your powers of reasoning, as evidenced in this sententious mediocrity you have foisted upon me.

The first gap in your slipshod scholarship, and the fatal flaw that completely invalidates your thesis, is a total disregard for, or a shocking ignorance of, the existence of the Pontiac Acadian.

Current statistical input conclusively demonstrates that not only does the 1978 Acadian virtually equate to the most popular German and Japanese vehicles in standard features, but that it undercuts them in cost. And, aside from the obvious virtue of possessing sensorially more detectable space for the bodily extremities of passengers, Pontiac Acadian also enjoys the technological edge of substantially simplified or altogether obviated maintenance¹. And all of this is not to mention the spiritual peace of mind provided by the presence of a vast network of 1200 General Motors Dealers coast-to-coast.

If you were possessed of the presence of mind and the scholarly curiosity to consult primary sources and conduct actual field research, i.e. investigating a Pontiac-Buick dealership and examining an Acadian under test-drive conditions, you would most assuredly have become cognizant of your blunder in blindly accepting "sans doute" the mythology of foreign small car supremacy, and I would have been deprived of the inestimable pleasure of informing you that you fail!

Director Treash buys Mozart as is Leonard Treash has spent many years as a director and teacher since his career as a professional singer. He is the guest conductor of the U of T opera department's current production of Don Giovanni, and is with the University of Texas.

What do you think of the U of T opera school?

Certainly one of the most complete organizations you can find anywhere. I don't know of any opera department in the States — except perhaps Indiana and Juilliard — as well-organized as this one.

Is the talent outlook good?

There are excellent voices in all categories. And by working in the opera school, students can spend the whole day at it. In the States, singers often have to collect degrees in musicology and literature, and pursue opera as a sideline. This system not only offers a thorough opera education, but it gives students the chance to determine for themselves whether they can continue as professional singers.

Has your early association with Fritz Reiner, both as a student and professional, influenced your approach to opera?

Oh, yes. He was a hard-liner as a person and a musician; he expected you to know things — there was no instruction as such. Exposure to him was educational because you made certain you could perform according to his demands. I could never function that way. I'm not that kind of disciplinarian.

I particularly wanted to ask about him because of the legends surrounding his tenure with the Chicago Symphony.

Chicago was one of the last things he did. He was much harsher and more indomitable in his early years. He minced no words, and never hesitated to inform you of your inadequacy. But most people respected him.

You're noted as a crusader for opera in English. Do you still encounter a lot of conservatism in North America?

A lot of regular patrons — who often don't know much — consider opera in the original very sophisticated, although translations are the norm elsewhere in the world. English is important to an inexperienced public. Even if they understand only sixty percent of the words, they're that much better off than people who insist on the original.

Was it your decision to do Don Giovanni in English?

Yes. We're using the text by Ruth and Thomas Martin — the senior translators in the world today.

My Toronto experience tells me that translations from Italian are much less welcome than from Russian and German.

Well, there is a large Italian-speaking population here. Also, Italian opera is by far the most commonly performed in North America.

People feel that they know the operas in Italian. I'm sure there are some who will wish we had done Don Giovanni in Italian, but I don't think the production would have progressed as well as it has. The cast, of course, is largely English-speaking.

Do singers use a less demonstrative class of gestures when they know what they're saying?

Is it easier to ham in Italian?

There is more encouragement to "draw pictures" in a foreign language. Of course you can ham in English. Don Giovanni is difficult in this respect — it's easy to go overboard.

Are there any particular productions of Don Giovanni that have influenced your interpretation of the work?

In the thirties, William Von Viemetal, a director at the Met, used to teach at the Curtis Institute. Pinza was learning Don Giovanni at the time, and I got the feeling that Viemetal was trying out his ideas out on me — a young student — first. I learned the role early, in the traditional way, much like Pinza. I grew up with the old Metropolitan productions, and the Mozart productions were the ones I liked best. Don Giovanni is at the top of the list for me — certainly it's the most difficult opera to direct. A Figaro production can be almost completely satisfying, but Don Giovanni is never perfect. I hesitated to accept the Opera department's invitation; it seemed much too ambitious. But I must say the students are very good. If anything goes wrong, it won't be their fault.

Do you see Mozart as a unique kind of stage art?

Very much so. In Meistersinger or Rosenkavalier, there's so much gush, little errors are covered. Don Giovanni is so fine, spare and lean, a single wrong gesture can make a difference. There are many hidden meanings that are very difficult to bring out.

Is the balance of comedy and tragedy a particular problem?

The comic side is easier; the students fall into it better.

What about Don Ottavio? Are you steering Mark Dubois to a serious or parodistic portrayal?

We're going directly to the parts. This production is not an effort to be radically different. Ottavio is fundamentally weak, but there's plenty there to believe in. He is faced with a real dilemma: he must remain loyal to Donna Anna, but finds it hard to believe his friend Don Giovanni killed her father and tried to rape her.

So generally, the alleged ironic tension between beautiful music and ridiculous characters doesn't enter the production?

No. That's seeing something that isn't there.

Ma's a Brecht girl

According to one recent reviewer of Bertolt Brecht's Mother Courage and her Children, the play is "bleak" and Leon Major, the director, has chosen to make the production "as austere and forbidding as the work itself". Don't let him scare you off. This play is not just for people who congregate in theatre lobbies during intermission to make decorous pronouncements on life, art, and sleeping arrangements in the Cave of Despayse.

than to get through the war with her wagon and her three children intact.

It turns out that even this is too much to ask.

Although it sounds like the perfect setting for a rehash of all the clichés about the horrors of war as well as a chance to air the pious platitudes of the true proletariat, it isn't. Brecht (as we might expect) has done some imaginative writing and is able to create interesting and amusing characters who impress us as real and differentiated people.

The cast is more than helpful in bringing Brecht's characters to life. Jennifer Phipps as Mother Courage has a real role to fill and she does it well. Kenneth Pogue as the chaplain and Gerard Parkes as the cook achieve marvellously witty presentations of character.

The production is enjoyable primarily because of the interest and liveliness that a uniformly good cast brings to it.

The play is being presented by Toronto Arts Productions at the St. Lawrence Centre.

Jennifer Carstens

It is true, of course, that the subject matter of the play is the Thirty Years War. At the time that Brecht wrote the play (1938-39) war was still alive in the German imagination. (For all history students who have only vague memories, that was the conflict that ended with the Treaty of Westphalia in 1648).

Mother Courage makes her living peddling goods and provisions to the soldiers and campfollowers of a Protestant regiment. Although she is poor and uneducated she is not taken in by the high-minded cant of the officers, generals and chaplains as they preach the morality of a religious war. She knows that she must live by her wits. Her aim in life is no higher

Berlin blasts Buttery

Doing their best to re-create the decadence which precipitated the fall of the Roman Empire, Trinity College students held their first Punk Evening last Friday night.

Featuring a number of pseudo-punk warm-up acts, all the bands looked mysteriously like Trinity students dressed in chic Sex-Pistol garb. Groups like the Sperm Whales and Hymen treated the motley crowd of onlookers gathered in the Buttery to some interesting numbers which sounded vaguely reminiscent of old Trogg's songs.

But the big event of the evening was the traumatic appearance of the feature band, Berlin. Eclectic? Dynamic? Devastating?

A band destined to go down in the annals. These four high-spirited lads bounced on stage and began their set with some good-natured kidding around. Led by lead singer and escapee from Sing-Sing, Mickey Gook, the fab four started with a charming version of Iggy Pop's "Raw Power".

Guitarist Vinnie Stigma played impressively on his guitar mainly by moving his fingers up and down the frets. Stigma was assisted by Andy Crass and drummer Billy Meat, who added to the loud and obnoxious stage presence of the frenetic foursome.

Rollicking his way through ballads like Lou Reed's "White Heat, White Heat" and Elvis Costello's "Mystery Dance", Mr. Gook managed to endear himself to the throng by gurgling water over the amps and throwing his stiff and paralyzed body around the stage in catleptic fits.

Which all reminds me of some liner notes I once read on an old Petula Clark album which said "Pet is a European smash". Will the quaint quads enjoy a similar success story? Who knows? They're loud, bad and obnoxious. And that's why I love them.

Neruda bound in barbed wire

The Open Circle Theatre production of The Splendour and Death of Joaquin Murieta is a gripping and timely piece of drama. Chilean Nobel Prize winner Pablo Neruda wrote the play in 1967 and the play expresses his optimistic belief that freedom could be achieved democratically; he uses as a vehicle the story of Joaquin Murieta, a Chilean bandit who dared defy the American vigilantes who murdered his countrymen in California, during the Gold Rush.

The optimism of Chile's national poet was first rewarded by the election of Salvador Allende in 1970, then smashed by the violent overthrowing of that government by the CIA-backed military junta now in rule. Director Sylvia Tucker has created a play within a play by setting Neruda's play within a modern day prison camp, thereby drawing the parallel between the American oppression in California during the 19th century and now, and bridging the time gap between 1967 and 1978.

One enters the theatre to see a dark prison camp, built of massive planks and corrugated iron, with prisoners sitting listlessly, and one searchlight shining into the eyes of the audience. There are high barbed wire fences on the front and sides of the stage which create a box in which the action is confined. One is aware of the distance between those Chileans in the camp and we, as a North American audience, and one sits, acutely uncomfortable, waiting for the action to begin.

The Splendour and Death of Joaquin Murieta is told in both Spanish and English, in poetry and song. It is a story of a simple people, pushed to beyond their breaking point by oppressive forces, and of their eventual retaliation. The splendour is the rising up of those people in anger — the substitution of the word for passivity. Death for the Chileans is a foregone conclusion; they must merely make a decision whether to go passively or actively. It is a sign of our insulation from the third world that to us, this is a foreign and somewhat uncivilized decision.

The play is hard for a North American to fully understand — it is full of emotions and words that we do not use today. We are brought back to earth, though, by the occasional switching on of the searchlight in the camp. It reminds us that we are in Chile in 1978, not in a fictional California in the 1800s, and that we are outside the barbed wire looking in at a group of people who have been unjustly imprisoned. It reminds us that there are things happening in this world that we are not told about, or do not choose to see. The story of Joaquin Murieta and of Chile is an important one and should be told.

Boys will be girls

Last Monday night at the Royal York Hotel's Imperial Room, female impersonator Craig Russell stepped over the rainbow and became the star of his own success story. What's more, he'd come home.

Russell's opening night drew a capacity crowd, liberally sprinkled with minor Canadian celebrities and press, not to mention the usual gay fans.

Ablly accompanied by Howard Cable and the Royal York Orchestra, Russell sang, swivelled, sashayed and sassed his way through a select repertoire of loquacious and lascivious ladies.

His Mae West, Tallulah Bankhead and Betty Davis impersonations were fun but primarily visual. There isn't a lot of room for innovation when you're doing a caricature of a hackneyed caricature.

But Russell as Bette Midler was as loud, lewd and looney as the real thing, and that means pure, unadulterated entertainment.

Russell's transformation into Streisand was slick but limited in scope. He tended to parody her as a corporation, as the mythical mouth, and not as a real person.

With Garland however, Russell virtually became the tousled, booze and pill-ridden singer, reeling through a throaty rendition of "Somewhere Over the Rainbow". His portrayal was not just poignant, it was intimate verging on tasteless.

As a confessed worshipper of these tough and gutsy female stars, Russell displays a surprising lack of insight into their genuine personalities, relaying instead upon their movie magazine personae. After once acting as personal secretary to the infamous Mae West, either Russell is none the wiser or he isn't telling.

He also delivered more than one low blow to several ladies, including Anne Murray and Maggie Trudeau. At these times, Russell seemed to be exploiting the typical "bitchy fag" image, saying no good about anyone if it could be bad. The audience loved it.

Throughout the hour-long show, Russell proved he was both a gifted vocalist and a superb mimic, especially as the paraffin Peggy Lee and the chatty Carol Channing. Although there was a partitioned dressing-room to the left of the tiny stage where Russell changed with lightning speed while making running commentary, he occasionally chose to assume a new role by merely adopting different expressions and mannerisms.

Even Russell's blue humour could not but augment the sophisticated professionalism of his act. The Imperial Room is no Club Manatee, and Craig Russell is not naive Robyn Turner. Although Russell may have been quaking in his high heels, he handled the audience with Vegas-style aplomb and sang-froid.

As a finale, wrapped in a sparkling, monogrammed dressing-gown, the outrageous Craig Russell finally became himself, belting out with verve, "It Ain't Easy in this Crazy World". A star in his own right, not just a reflection of other luminaries. It was a stunning evening.

T.O. folkies, Tamblyn and Raffi: revival of an endangered species

In reading the entertainment sections of the Toronto papers you encounter all manner of music, from classical to New Wave Punks with a little jazz thrown in for leavening. Ten years ago the 'folkie' and his doings would also have graced these pages. He was, in fact, flourishing to the point that none of us would have believed that in 1978 the breed would be an endangered species.

Passenger pigeons, we recall, used to darken the Kansas skies at migration time but the last few died in captivity, in small cages in zoos where the curious might go to gawk. The Folkie it would seem is headed down that path.

There are, however, a few survivors. Two of these, Ian Tamblyn and Raffi, appeared in town recently to draw the curious to those slightly anachronistic zoological sanctuaries The Groaning Board and The Riverboat.

It is always disconcerting, and particularly so when he is flirting with the way of the dodo, to see a performer not get the break he deserves. This was, sadly, the case with Tamblyn at the Groaning Board. Through no fault of his own he was faced by an audience doing a convincing masquerade as a brick wall. The Board's counter-culture clientele was too involved in its gobbling of bean-sprouts and lentil curries to do more than burp at Tamblyn's offerings. His gentle wit and boy-next-door charm made no dent in the self-satisfaction of the food fanatics. He remarked later that food and drink take priority for owner Harry Stinson (a name from which the 'k' has been inexplicably dropped), and that the entertainer is relegated to the status of background music. Musicians are on the Board's stage to augment or excuse the atmosphere, not to create it. The waitresses continue to serve and clear during the sets, a habit both disturbing and needless. Thus, with my compliments to the chef, Tamblyn's creativity and musicianship went largely unnoticed.

This was unfortunate because he did little wrong. Tamblyn excels on piano but the stage arrangement kept his back to the audience which severely limited his impact. His lyrics are complex and philosophic but his touch with them, is deft, and occasionally good-humoured enough, to clear him of charges of heaviness. His voice has an easy-does-it quality which lends itself well to the harmony provided by Kim Erikson, a member of his band. Tamblyn's new album, Closer To Home, is dedicated to Kim, and appropriately so, as her subtle vocals are a strong, supportive force, adding depth and variety to the songs.

Around the block the Riverboat lies sunk beneath the chi-chi boutiques, the Chargex signs, the BMWs and grey (probably rented) Cadillacs and all the other impediments of the denizens of Saturday Night. It's an appropriate burial ground with the Riverboat serving as a memento mori for the era before the Caddies replaced the cherry-top and the credit cards the handlers of the pan.

Installed in this mausoleum was Raffi, a folksinger who is best known as Canada's hottest children's entertainer, a claim which seems valid enough when you've seen him brave a crowd of 400 six year olds in Waterloo church basement.

But what's he doing at the Riverboat, surely six year olds can't afford the exorbitant cover charge? It seems that he has diversified, and now includes adults. Cynics remarked that he's been recruiting his fans young and now that he sings adult songs too he can hold their attention for many record-buying years. It's not, however, all commercialism. Raffi was a plain folksinger long before he discovered children. He's been playing small clubs and festivals since 1969.

His music is unpretentious. He admits that he enjoys singing other people's songs while noting that his concert commitments leave him little time to compose on his own. What he does write is more interesting musically than lyrically. Perhaps his best work, which appears on his first album Good Luck Boy, is a musical impression of a visit to Armenia, his homeland.

The Riverboat, unlike the Groaning Board, is designed for folk. It's cosy. The waitresses do not serve during the sets, and refrain from engaging in the hard sell cum dirty look pressure so prevalent at the Board. It is like a large recreation room and Raffi, even without slippers, looked right at home. His back-up consisted of Ken Whitely of the Original Sloth Band, who exudes a quiet confidence as he serves as a more than competent complement to Raffi's guitar.

At the Riverboat Raffi previewed his new album Adult Entertainment. It appears to be an inoffensive set of ballads, exploring what Raffi calls "the adult enjoyment of re-connecting with the child inside" and it should be available almost immediately.

So folkies are still alive, even if they can't be said to be kicking. Their music may not be as socially conscious as it once was, but it's still a viable form of entertainment. The problem is finding an establishment that will give artists like Tamblyn and Raffi the chance they deserve.

Alreet. It party time in the big cabbage. Starting off the list of musical luminaries that will be gracing our fair city in the next month we have the immortal Blue Oyster Cult at the Gardens on the 9th. Not to be outdone, heavy metal kings the Chieftains will be at Massey on the 11th. Then, king of the jazz violin, Stephen Grappelli will breeze in on the 12th. Not to be outdone for sensitive lyricism, Journey will grace the Hall on the 14th. On the same evening Kate and Anna McGarrigle dance into Con Hall on bruised knees.

But enough of this gay banter, I've been saving the best for last. Gorbo Lightfoot is playing for a week, that's right, seven days, starting on the 18th at Massey. If it weren't already almost sold out, I'd buy up the entire front row. As it is I'm going to stay home and watch Anna Murray try to sell me a bank loan.

But hold, there's more to come. That's right, the pub circuit is jumping (a technical term) this week. The Tube, my favourite night spot, has Harbinger, the El Mo has the Diodes (next week it's the immortal Elvis Costello), the Knob has Wireless, the Nick has Full House, the Board has the Original Sloth Band, the Bev has the Dishes, the Horse has Red Room Hotel, the Shammy has The Farmer, Space has the Glass Orchestra, the Works has the Hunt and the Co has Wooden Teeth. Last and not least, at Doc's see Shooter tonight.

Hello Jazz Fans! Catch Bob Wilber's soprano saxophone artistry at Bourbon St. this week.

At George's, Moe Koffman's Quintet entertains the weekend diners. On Monday, the Ted Moses Quintet will re-emerge after some quiet months underground. Trumpeter and flugelhornist Mike Malone will probably lend his considerable talents to the quintet. Tomorrow Stop 33 in the Sutton Place Hotel features the Ed Bickert Quartet.

Superb pianist Frank Falco brings his group into Cafe Soho, 334 Queen W. for two after-hours shows at 1 a.m. tonight and tomorrow, and a Sunday afternoon concert at 2:30 p.m. Hopefully saxophonist Jane Fair will come along. The group will also play in the Copper Lounge at the Inn on the Park on Saturday afternoon.

Free concert tonight, 5 p.m., at the Eatons' Centre: Ron Rully featuring vocalist Aura.

At the Science Centre Monday at 8 p.m.: the Sammy Noto Quintet (trumpet). Free with admission.

The Colonial Tavern will present the Dollar Band Ensemble March 9-11. On Sunday March 19, two Sony Greenlich concerts at $6.50 per seat. More on these next week.

Harbourfront will attempt to initiate a modern jazz policy this Sunday by featuring the Alex Kirov Quintet from 2-5 p.m. We can look forward to regular Friday night jazz performances if Ted Moses' Canada Council grant comes through. Jim McHarg's Midnight Special plays Dixie Sunday night.

The U of T opera department's production of Mozart's Don Giovanni opens tonight and continues tomorrow, Monday, and Tuesday, with alternating casts. Performances begin at eight in the MacMillan Theatre, students $2.50. See the interview on p.9.

Also tonight, Greta Kraus, Robert Aitken, Victor Martin and "friends" offer an all-Bach program, including the Musical Offering. St. Lawrence Centre, some rush seats at 8:00.

Northstars have pulled the coup of the season by landing the great classical pianist Mieczyslaw Horowitz for their Saturday night Mozart series. He's only 86, and, I believe, the last living pupil of Theodor Leschetitzky. Castle Frank auditorium at 8:30, tickets $4.50.

Beethoven's Septet and Quintet, Op. 16 are featured Sunday at three in a recital by senior Faculty members. Walter Hall, students $3.

Hamburg soprano Tatiana Troyanos will give a recital of Mozart, Handel, Schubert, and Berg at the St. Lawrence Monday night. It's a sell-out, but some seats will be available at eight.

The Toronto Mendelssohn Choir is performing with the TSO Wednesday night in Massey Hall. Program includes Berlioz's Te Deum and Britten's Spring Symphony. Student discounts at all price levels.

The Chamber Music Society of Lincoln Centre will play Beethoven, Brahms and Schumann Thursday at the St. Lawrence, but the Massey Hall offering of Ashkenazy and Perlman playing Beethoven wins hands down. Tickets start at $5.

11:00 at night, playing a diverse range of musical sounds. Radio Varsity News pops up three times daily at 12:30, 3:30 and 6:30. Special Features are broadcast twice daily at 12:45 and 6:45, right after the news.

But where, you may ask, can Radio Varsity be heard? Hart House Tuck Shop, UC Junior Common Room and Refectory, Whitney Hall Common Rooms and both the SAC building, and the SAC Media building. If you want to tune in to Radio Varsity, just turn up the volume on the speakers.

RV needs your support. We're always looking for fresh talent and new ideas. So why not become involved in campus radio? Without your active support, RV will cease to exist on March 15th. On this date, SAC will decide our fate. We believe in the concept of RV as a true viable communications alternative, and we think we can convince you. Why not drop on over to our studios at 91 St. George St., 3rd floor.

Lady Swimmers Chase Canadian Title

The Lady Blues swim team is hoping that this is the year they establish themselves as the best team in Canada at the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union (CIAU) championships being held at the Etobicoke Olympium this weekend.

Over the last few years the ladies have fielded strong teams but have not finished higher than third since 1974. It looks like the trend could be reversed this year.

This optimism stems from their impressive showing in the Ontario finals. Two weeks ago they swept the provincial championship meet winning eight of 15 events.

This marks an impressive improvement over the previous year when they also placed first, but won only five races.

Part of the reason for the improvement stems from Toronto's rookies.

Anne Marie Latta may be new to the Varsity swim team but she is by no means a rookie swimmer. She competed on the 1973 Canada Games Team, and was a member of the 1974-75 Canadian Standing Team. Her importance to the team was shown in the OUAA's when she set individual records in winning the 200 yard butterfly, the 100 yard freestyle and the 100 yard butterfly.

Rookie Nancy Lee showed promise for the future by winning the 100 yard breast-stroke and finishing strong in both the 200 and 400 yard individual medleys.

Other freshmen, Elaine Keith and Lianne Hubbard also turned in good performances. Keith finished second to teammate Karen LeGresley in both the 400 and 800 freestyle. Hubbard came second in the 400 individual medley.

Anchoring the team is veteran

Karen LeGresley. The third year Landscape Architecture student was a member of the 1972 Olympic team.

Last year, LeGresley took golds in the 200, 400 and 800 yard freestyles at the OUAA's. She followed this up with wins in the 200 and 400 yard freestyles at the Canadian championships. So far it seems that history is repeating itself as LeGresley repeated her performance at the Ontario finals.

Acadia is the team to beat if the Blues are to take the top spot. Last year Acadia took the title by almost 100 points, with a team that featured talent and depth.

Other stiff competition will come from Alberta (second place finisher last year), Western (second to Toronto at the OUAA championships), Waterloo (Canadian champions in 1976) and Lakehead (second in Canada in 1976).

Anne Marie Latta: an important improvement to this year's team.

Elaine Keith combines with Latta to give the Blues a potent one-two punch.

Fan Support Brings Out Best In Players

By HOWARD DEANE

It was something Varsity Arena and the Blues hadn't seen for some time—lineups—as over 4,000 hockey fans turned up to see the Blues clinch the OUAA Eastern Division Title on Wednesday night.

By 7:00, an hour before the game, there were already lineups at the ticket windows. Lately, the only lineups seen at Varsity Arena are at the concession stands.

About 1,000 of the fans were from York, but this only served to increase the excitement of the cross-town rivalry. "It really got the adrenalin going," said OUAA scoring champ, Doug Caines. "Having so many fans makes the game worthwhile, and the York fans get your gander up," added five year veteran Doug Herridge.

The team felt it was a pleasant change, after playing before many "less than packed" crowds. "The guys were really high," commented Varsity defenceman Rob Gemmell. "Before the game, the dressing room seemed to explode, and when we're high nobody's gonna' beat us."

The Blues, obviously up for the game, were champing at the bit and came charging onto the ice at the start of each period. They did however, let up towards the end of the game, but only after acquiring a 7-2 lead. Gemmell explains, "We wanted the fans to come back Friday night, so we made it kinda' close. We were teasing them."

The crowd was a throwback to the late '60's and early '70's when Varsity Arena used to be sold out, even for regular season games. Former U of T student, Chris Mitskinis (1968-73) remembers, "All the games used to be this crowded. But back then the big rivalry wasn't Toronto-York, it was Toronto-Waterloo. When they used to play, it was war."

Another student in the early '70's, Dave McWatters stated, "we never missed a home game here in five years. It used to be for a game like this, if you didn't get here by 7:00 you'd never get in. They'd be hanging from the rafters. We used to be able to scalp our two-dollar tickets for four dollars."

Tonight at 8:00 the Blues will play host to the Sir Wilfrid Laurier Golden Hawks, in the first game of the best of three OUAA final. The Hawks made their way to the final by beating the Western Mustangs 6-0 Tuesday night.

The Blues responded to the large crowd by scoring goals and doing a little crowding of their own.

Blues team members were indifferent as to whom they would rather play for the Ontario Title—Western or Laurier. However, Herridge was the exception. "I'd rather play Laurier. It's a shorter bus ride," he quipped.

The Blues are hoping that the rejuvenated crowd support is more than a one night affair and the fans will be back tonight.

Scarborough Salvages Pride By Tying League Leaders

By JAMES McLEAN

With the end of the interfac regular season nearing, some teams are faced with a last minute chance to salvage respectability. This was clearly the case Monday night as Scarborough and St. Mike's played to a 1-1 tie.

Both teams had something to gain with a victory. St. Mike's needed the two points to secure first place while Scarborough wanted a win to regain the respectability which they have lost over the season because of their last place record.

Scarborough, with only four extra players, shut out St. Mike's in the first period despite the fact that St. Mike's spent ninety per cent of the time in Scarborough's end.

Scarborough's superb goal-tending seem to spur the rest of the team on.

Apparently this was the lift Scarborough needed as Ed Boddy shovelled in a quick pass from Glen Innamoto to give his team a 1-0 edge.

The second period contained some fine end to end play. Both teams played solid defence, neither one allowing more than seven shots on goal. What makes this even more interesting is the fact that Scarborough coach John Whitehead juggled his team to the extent that the regular defence played forward and vice-versa. Perhaps an earlier strategy of this type along with some much needed bench strength could have put Scarborough in a playoff berth.

As the period progressed, Scarborough found itself the victim of exhaustion, allowing St. Mike's many impressive offensive surges. But it wasn't until the fifteen minute mark of the second period that St. Mike's John Borksoh banged in an unassisted goal to tie the game.

Many later attempts by St. Mike's to take the lead were dampened by Scarborough's consistent checking and positional play. One glove save in particular by the Scarborough goalie prevented a seemingly sure goal.

During the final minute of play with the puck in Scarborough's end, St. Mike's made a desperate attempt to take the lead by pulling their goaltender. This attempt proved anything but successful as Innamoto shot the puck into the empty net only to have the goal disallowed because of a fighting infraction.

Scarborough ends their regular season Thursday night and have little to look forward to except icing a more unified and competitive team next year. Perhaps with the addition of a few full-hearted competitors they will regain playoff status and maybe even another championship.

St. Mike's, although they may not finish first in the standings, remain a serious contender for the Jennings Cup. Their superb coaching and team play, strongly accented by desire go together to form the makings of a championship team. The playoffs, however, will provide the real answer to this!

Side Line By-Line

By JIM O'LEARY

If reports emanating from the federal government are to be taken seriously, then it appears that Major Junior A hockey will decline in importance as a supplier of personnel for professional hockey. The new training ground for professional hopefuls could become university hockey.

In Ottawa last week, Fitness and Amateur Sport Minister Iona Campagnola attacked junior hockey, describing it as ruthless, unfair and an impediment to education. She recommended that the establishment of a national University hockey league be studied as an alternative for young hockey players.

Also last week, a development program for Canada's Olympic hockey team was announced which would rely heavily on co-operation from university hockey. It is planned that Canada's best amateurs from junior, university and senior hockey be selected to represent Canada at the Olympics.

The implementation of this program would almost certainly guarantee an Olympic team comprised mostly of University players. Juniors would be hard-pressed to make the team because of schedule restrictions which would impede players from leaving their teams for months at a time. Also, university players are in general better suited for Olympic hockey because of an edge in experience, size and strength.

Senior hockey players would have difficulty earning many spots on the Olympic team because for the most part these are recreational players who don't devote enough time to hockey to get into the type of physical condition required for Olympic competition.

These recommendations could be the beginning of the phasing out of junior hockey as we know it today. Junior hockey teams have become too expensive to run and are not as important as they once were for producing pros because of the rapidly declining market.

The development of a national university hockey league and an Olympic program are interesting propositions which could lure many of the best young players away from junior hockey.

Take for example, the case of a very good 18-year-old hockey player. Assuming he has finished high school, the government and universities could combine to offer him a package which would offer him a chance to get a university education, travel around the world, play exhibition games against top teams from Europe, play for his country in the Olympics, and have access to the top coaches and training facilities this country has to offer. At the end of his stint at university he would be a finely conditioned and trained athlete ready to move on to professional hockey if he so desired.

All that would be needed to give such a program credibility is to lure one top player who proved that university hockey could be used as a training ground for the pros. This should not be hard to do.

Over the last few years there have been quite a few players who outgrew Junior Hockey by the time they were 18. Mark Napier, Mark Howe, Bryan Trottier and Wilf Paiment are just a few who come to mind.

Indications are that by the time Wayne Gretzky is 18 he also will find that junior hockey lacks the necessary competition to keep him motivated. At 16 years of age, and in his rookie season, he is currently second in league scoring, averaging well over two points per game.

If a player such as Gretzky could be convinced to take up the challenge of university and international hockey (and there is no reason to think he wouldn't), then it is likely that other players would follow. It only took the signing of Bobby Hull to give the WHA credibility.

A possible stumbling block to the implementation of such a program could be the federal government's insistence on giving scholarships. At present, scholarships are prohibited by the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union (CIAU).

In a recent newspaper report, Campagnola attacked the CIAU's position on scholarships as "righteous" because they fail to see that scholarships can be "a vehicle to encourage both academic and athletic pursuits."

This could be a good time for the CIAU to review its stand on scholarships. At present many schools are making a farce of the rules anyway. While they may not be offering scholarships per se, many schools give under-the-table incentives to athletes.

The CIAU could probably be persuaded to change their stance on scholarships once they see the benefits they can accrue from drawing top players to their schools. Along with top competition comes increased revenue in the form of gate receipts. In the present economic climate, there are not too many schools that could afford to let an opportunity like this pass by.

Student aid details leaked

THE Varsity TORONTO

Vol. 98, No. 57
Mon., Mar. 6, 1978

By TOM KUHN and
KEN WHITEHURST

Parents will contribute more money to pay for their children's post-secondary educations, and students will receive less for living expenses under the new Ontario Study Grant Plan (OSG) than under the present assistance program.

This is according to a document provided to The Varsity by the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS). OFS described the document as a "confidential Ministry document".

Colleges and Universities Minister Harry Parrott angrily refused comment on the new aid program: "I said we would publish those things for everyone on March 9. It will be my intention to do that job as well as I can, and until that time, there is no comment."

Student council president John Tuzyk commented: "The new student aid plan is much worse than we anticipated. Therefore, the special meeting on Monday (today at 3:00 p.m. in the Med Sci Auditorium) on the proposed demonstration (March 16 at Queen's Park) is much more important."

Although the eligibility criteria of the new OSG plan are more restrictive than the existing OSAP program (were it continued), the new plan eliminates OSAP's mandatory loan requirement.

Under the existing system students have to take out a mandatory thousand dollar Canada Student Loan (CSL) before they can receive a provincial grant, but the new system determines grant eligibility first and makes up the balance of a student's need with an interest-free loan.

A student must repay that loan or begin paying interest on it six months after graduation.

If the present system were to continue into next year, parental contributions to a student's post-secondary education would start at $7,600 net income; parental contributions under the new system will start at $6,600 net income.

Parental contributions are determined by a means test. That test includes an assessment of parental and student income. Parents and students must provide a tax statement as evidence of their gross earnings.

A parent's net income is derived by deducting income taxes, medical expenses, pension payments, allowance for dependent children, babysitting allowance, and working spouse allowance from gross income.

The increased parental contribution results from the elimination of a deduction for those dependents who are post-secondary students. A student will still be considered dependent, however, unless he has spent three years in the workforce.

A student will contribute 50 percent of his summer savings toward his educational costs. Summer savings are determined by subtracting $50 per week for summer living costs from a student's gross summer income. An unemployed student is not required to contribute to his educational costs, but must provide proof of his actively seeking employment.

Investment income, income from other work and income from academic awards also figure in the assessment of a student's contribution.

The OFS analysis points to reduced living allowances for students living at home and away from home.

The new plan allows students living at home $25 a week for living expenses as compared to $36 allowed by OSAP this year.

This year, a student living away from home was allowed $61 a week for living expenses, but OSG will allow $65 a week. If OSAP were continued next year, OFS projected that students living away from home would receive $70 per week.

Distressed by the details of the new assistance plan, the New Democratic Party plans to raise the matter in the Legislature during today's Question Period.

"Fewer students will have the opportunity to go to university, for purely financial reasons. U of T has already indicated they may drop their standards in order to try and drag in more people, hoping the ones eliminated for financial reasons are offset by students who can afford it but don't have the grades required," reacted NDP MPP David Warner.

Liberal Colleges and Universities Critic John Sweeney said: "On the surface, it seems to me, both the new eligibility periods and the parental contributions are negative factors, and it seems the student summer earnings contribution is a positive step."

He praised the ministry's decision to pro-rate grant eligibility periods for part-time students. Pro-rating will allow part-time students to receive provincial grants after their eligibility periods run out, if their rate of progress is satisfactory.

The document supplied by OFS reaffirmed the government's intention to use loan remission as a method of softening the effect of the new system on those students presently receiving government assistance.

Details of how the loan remission will work were not included in that document.

The Blues are on the way to the National Final after a pair of wins for Queen's Cup on the weekend. Details page 12.

Parrott furious at plan leak

By KEN WHITEHURST

Colleges and Universities Minister Harry Parrott greeted with outrage an invitation to comment on his new student assistance plan slated to be unveiled March 9 but leaked to the Ontario Federation of Students and subsequently given to The Varsity.

"If you were as interested in the fairness of a democracy, as I am, and the survival of our system, as I think you should be, you would want to be a partner in the preservation of all that's good in a democracy," he declared.

"Instead, you try to upstage on every possible opportunity — for what gain — I say it's for a selfish gain to make a point when with every effort I tried to the very best of my ability, and the system has tried," he continued, his voice trembling with emotion.

"When the system has been told on the ninth of March they will have all the details, now that's important, it's important that Joe Blow has the same chance as the next guy, but you want to destroy some of those things. Would you like it if I gave your enemy a chance to get ahead of you? No! That's not the way the rules are written to be played in a democracy."

"I've tried my damndest to enter into a dialogue with the students. We postponed our announcements so we could moderate the program according to much of the dialogue we received from students," he complained.

"I want fairness in the system; I want the opportunities for the people in Thunder Bay, in Kingston, for wherever they might be, to have the same opportunity as those who would beat the system, and I'm not going to condone, for one minute, the fact that it's out sooner in certain areas of this province than it should have been."

"I'm really disappointed with the tremendous amount of consultation that has gone on in this that you would not consider it your responsibility, not mine, to keep that faith," he stated.

"No one was to release that information until March 9, and it was to be released to all at the same time. You don't seem to understand that is a very valid position to take in a democracy. Why wouldn't you want to make it fair to everyone? And so until March 9, when everyone has had a chance to look at it in detail, I'm not making comments to anyone."

U of T may close on 16th

By HEATHER HILL

The U of T may join other Ontario universities in a campus-wide closure on March 16, the day of a cutbacks protest rally at Queen's Park.

Student council president John Tuzyk, on behalf of the U of T Cutbacks Coalition, delivered a letter to U of T president John Evans asking for closure of the university for "a few hours in the afternoon" to enable everyone to go to the rally.

Evans said last night that the request will be met by consultation with the provost's office among others and that a decision will probably be reached by Wednesday. Evans said he disagreed with closing the entire university because "those people who don't want to participate can't do what they normally do. I think it's good to have some freedom of choice."

Evans said he preferred the "pattern of previous situations" — the different divisions would be requested not to schedule exams on that day nor to exercise penalties on absent students.

If U of T shuts down March 16, it will join a growing province-wide protest.

o York University's Board of Senate voted last week to endorse the rally and to close the university for the day. A meeting between members of the York Cutbacks Coalition and university president H. Ian Macdonald Friday discussed the vote and a decision from Macdonald is imminent.

o Steve Shallhorn, student senator at McMaster University, moved last week to close the university March 16. Hismotion, seconded by the president of the faculty association, will be voted on by the Senate later this week.

o Trent University will be closed March 16 after seven students occupying the comptroller's office forced the university to meet this demand.

o The faculty association of Seneca College will be voting later this week on whether they will hold a wildcat strike at the college the day of the demonstration.

o Paul Cossano, president of the Ontario Confederation of University Faculty Associations (OCUFA), has personally endorsed the rally and in a phone conversation with Professor Lee Lorch of York on March 2 encouraged OCUFA member associations to do so.

o Jean Smith, president of the U of T Faculty Association (UTFA), announced last week that UTFA supported the rally and would say today whether they would give financial support as well.

o The Metro Cutbacks Coalition (York, U of T and Ryerson) held a six-hour meeting last Thursday to discuss the platform of the brief they will present to the Ontario Cabinet March 16, and to settle logistics of the rally.

o Brock University, which opposed the rally at an Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) conference last weekend, has subsequently decided to support it and will be sending a contingent to Queen's Park.

o OFS at the conference passed a motion that the rally should be province-wide and urged member institutions to join it.

A general student meeting is taking place at the Medical Sciences Auditorium at 3:00 p.m. today to decide U of T's role in the rally. SAC is also planning to distribute March 13 a tabloid sheet detailing the effects of cutbacks. The tabloid will be distributed across campus.

SAC election fight finally begin to shape up

By TOM KUHN

Renewed interest in Students' Administrative Council (SAC), seats, and real competition in the presidential race became clear as nominations closed on Friday.

A total of 60 have been nominated for council seats, in addition to the presidential slates of Brian Hill, Mark McElwain and Reva Sober; and Tom Simpson, Rob Mowat and Dave Beaton.

Seats for Architecture, Music, Physical Education, Rehabilitation Medicine, Emmanuel, Wycliffe, as well as some seats at Erindale and Scarborough have not been filled. Nominations will be re-opened for these constituencies all week until 12 noon Friday (March 10).

"It's an incredibly good number of people running. It's an increase of 25 per cent from last year," said SAC president John Tuzyk.

Fourteen are running for five seats at University College. Ten are running for six seats at Victoria. Four are running for one seat at Trinity. Contested elections will be held in Engineering, St. Hilda's, Innis, St. Michael's College and New College as well.

The presidential elections have two slates, one headed by a current SAC VP, the other by a SAC Engineering Rep.

Brian Hill (Scar. IV) served as a SAC rep for Scarborough in 1976-77, and during that year joined the SAC executive. He was appointed to the Planning and Resources Subcommittee of Governing Council and was reappointed this year when he was SAC Vice-President.

Running mate Mark McElwain (UC III) has been SAC rep for Knox College since 1976. He also worked as Deputy External Commissioner this past year. Third on the ticket Reva Sober (Nursing) is the Student Services Director for her faculty and a member of the SAC services Commission.

Hill felt that one of the big issues was education. He said cutbacks have created "many, many problems," but SAC can't grasp the full extent of them because it doesn't have enough contacts in the course unions. He aims to remedy this by co-opting the unions into the SAC Education Commission and keeping closer relations with students on the Arts and Science Council.

Hill also wants to continue pressing the authorities for improved student aid. He saw the right of graduate and professional students to receive assistance as an important issue.

Tom Simpson (Engin IV), who heads the ticket which includes Rob

Mowat and Dave Beaton, (Arts and Sci III), has spent 'hours and hours' on SAC although he has not been on its executive. Simpson has been Deputy Communications Commissioner, member of The Varsity Committee (Secretary-Treasurer), SAC finance commission, and on the Engineering Society Council as University Committee chairman.

Rob Mowat is president of the Erindale College Student Union, Erindale College Council, and is a former staffer of Erindale's newspaper, Medium II. Dave Beaton, the third person on the ticket, is a second V.P.-Treasurer of the New College Student Council, and is on the Planning and Priorities Committee of New College Council.

Simpson says cutbacks is the big issue this year. "We'll be concerned with cutbacks that affect the quality of education. This year SAC looked at the wider issue including student aid and unemployment," said Simpson.

"With the U of T budget which just came down, we'll be facing cut courses, and cut teaching staffs next year," said Simpson.

Simpson said his campaign would also stress restructuring power to give the SAC council and student societies actual power.

Tight '79 budget approved

By PHILIP LIBMAN

In just under two hours last Wednesday the Business Affairs Committee of Governing Council approved the U of T's recommended 1978-79 budget of $271-million.

Working at a rate of about $40,000 a second, the committee recommended approval of the budget as suggested by the Budget Committee to Governing Council.

All the points noted in The Varsity of March 1, which were the highlights of the proposed budget, were approved with little comment by the committee.

Alex Rankin, Vice-President, Business Affairs, presented a short document entitled "Budget Highlights and Proposed Recommendations" which aimed "to place this financial plan in focus."

"Next year's budget will almost be balanced, producing a deficit of only $157,000," said Rankin. "Together with this year's deficit of $2.8-million this will leave a cumulative deficit on April 30, 1979, of $2.9-million."

The Provincial Government provides 84 per cent of U of T's basic income and the budgetary increase for 1978-79 was held to 4.8 per cent. This formula for university funding is based on enrolment and now there are distinctions between graduate and undergraduate enrolment, explained Rankin.

The former category has been frozen to 1976-77 levels and the undergraduate funding is now being averaged over three years so as to take into consideration fluctuations in enrolment, Rankin said.

Enrolment funding has changed three times, said U of T president John Evans. "The present system has the Ministry of Colleges and Universities deal with a set budget which is then divided among all the universities and colleges in the province. This has also served to lower the amount of money available for universities."

The budget was achieved by asking every department to take a three per cent budget cut and the non-academic departments a five per cent cut. No set priorities were given and the cut applied equally to efficient and inefficient divisions of the university. Asked if this was an effective way of making a budget, Evans replied that it was up to each division where the cuts would be made.

"While we directed this process centrally, the divisions may exercise choices. They (the department heads) know how to minimize their problems. And in partnership with us they can cope with the reductions."

Evans said the budget prevented divisions from exporting their budget cuts by setting guidelines. He cited the stable numbers of graduate assistants at U of T.

"We couldn't reach into each department but each dean knows his department, and with budget reviews going on for five years we have accumulated a lot of information (about each department)."

"The recollection of all this information is important in the budget-making process and the deans know which are the lean and fat departments. We felt this was the most effective budget-making process open to us given the cutbacks."

Governing Council candidates

By ALAN STEWART

Election fever still rages on the Governing Council scene. Today The Varsity interviews the third of four candidates for the Part-Time Undergraduate Student seat (Constituency I):

"The tenor of my voice would be relatively moderate," says John Dadds. "You've got to be reasonable without giving up too much."

Dadds, a 37-year-old part-time student at Erindale College, says that his major concern is to give part-time students more input at Governing Council. He says that part-time students are made to feel like second-class students on campus; that is something he hopes to change. According to Dadds, close liaison with the Association of Part Time Students (APUS) and with the part-time students he meets on campus will enable him to represent the views of his constituency.

Dadds feels that the problem of cutbacks is the major issue on campus at this time. Working for the Ontario Government has taught him, he says, that "retrenchment" is taking place all throughout society. Governing Council must order the priorities of the university so that cutbacks have as little effect as possible. In particular, says Dadds, the jobs of those who work for the university must be guaranteed; any reductions in staff should be achieved through attrition.

Dadds is also concerned with insuring that a wide variety of academic courses is maintained for part-time students on campus.

Dadds gave qualified support to the New New Program at Erindale, on the grounds that a four-year degree without specialization has little value in the job market at this time. But he said he would try to ensure that none of its requirements is made retroactive, to protect students already in the system.

The candidate is concerned that the Macdonald Report, if implemented, would decrease the number of students from the suburban campuses at Governing Council. Dadds feels that the suburban campuses need separate constituencies at every level because of the advantage that candidates from the St. George campus have in a university-wide election.

Energy, enthusiasm and experience in the work force are what Dadds feels to be his major advantages. "I can't offer a lot of experience in university politics," he admits. But he hopes that the voters will appreciate the advantage of electing a mature student who has experienced "the frustration and stress of combining work with study."

The constitution of the University of Toronto Faculty Association requires candidates for President to be nominated by members of the UTFA Council. Members of the Association, however, are invited to suggest names to council members.

Nomination forms are available in the UTFA office in the TIF TOP TAILOR BUILDING, 455 Spadina Avenue. The nomination form requires the signature of 2 members of the UTFA Council and must be returned to the office by March 10. The election will be conducted by a mailed ballot of the membership in the following two weeks.

REAL INPUT

So Parrott was going round Ontario looking for student input into the new student aid plan was he?

The new plan certainly doesn't show it. Parents are going to be contributing more money and students are going to be getting less. Hardly a plan that students could have designed. But then of course, we didn't expect any better. As we said at the time Parrott came visiting, his tour was just a PR job intended to placate students with the thought that they had a say in the planning of the new scheme. Few students fell for it and those who did will have no illusions left after they discover the details of the new plan.

The details of the new grant plan come appropriately just a few days after the release of next year's proposed U of T budget. The connection goes deeper than just a conjunction of release dates. Both the U of T budget and student aid depend on government funding. Both are being underfunded and in both cases the ones to suffer are students. There are going to be fewer courses offered at the university, classes are going to get more crowded, profs are going to be harder to track down at the same time that fewer and fewer students are going to be able to afford university.

The proposed mass demonstration at Queen's Park on March 16 brings these issues together. It will give us an opportunity to advance from grumbling about our situation to doing something about it. One demonstration, of course is not going to change the government's position. The March 16 demonstration must be viewed as part of a persistent and long-term campaign. This and other issues will be discussed at tomorrow's SAC general meeting. Unlike the meeting with Parrott, this will allow you a real say in what students are going to be doing in the next couple of months. It's worthy to note that when

Parrott learned that we were in possession of the new plan one of his comments was that one doesn't give information to one's enemies. We don't have to ask who Dr. Parrott's enemies are.

letters & opinions

SAC supports rally

This year, SAC, in concert with other Ontario Students through our participation in OFS, has attempted through a variety of means to influence provincial government policy with respect to major issues facing students and the post-secondary education community.

We have concentrated on three major areas of concern: namely, student aid, the quality of education and unemployment.

1. Student Aid

While the activity of previous years in this area have brought about some positive changes (grant before loan as the first form of assistance, contribution from summer earnings to be based on actual resources), two extremely important facets of the new proposals will have very detrimental effects on accessibility to universities and colleges. The limitation on grant eligibility will cut off grant assistance to approximately 20 per cent of those currently receiving it. This change will undoubtedly limit participation in many professional faculties and graduate schools to those of affluent means. The new parental contribution table, which shows what level of contribution is expected from parents of a given income has not yet been released. As Dr. Parrott, the Minister of Colleges and Universities, has admitted that it is prepared, many fear that the delay means the new parental contribution table is even more unrealistic than the current one is.

2. Cutbacks

The announced level of government expenditure on the post-secondary system for next year do not come close to meeting the effects of inflation. Indeed, the government's own advisory body, the Ontario Council on University Affairs (OCUA), has said the total is $26 million short of what is required to maintain the current level of operation, and the university administrators have said that the total is $90 million short. This funding shortfall will have severe implications for the quality and cost of our education.

3. Unemployment

Terry Jones, M.P.P., government spokesman for the Youth Secretariat, has said that this summer one in seven students will be unemployed. As of last October, 20 per cent of '77 university graduates seeking employment were still looking. There has been little action on the part of the government to deal with this problem.

In attempting to influence government policy in these areas, SAC and OFS have met on a number of occasions with Dr. Parrott, and as well organized Lobby Day, when practically all M.P.P.'s met with student representatives. We have worked extensively to influence media coverage of these issues and were to a great extent successful in this regard (e.g. MacLean's article dealing with student aid, Oct.). Our efforts culminated with the recent meeting of OFS with members of the provincial cabinet.

It seems that these efforts to this point have had little effect on government policy. Indeed, the recent announcement of funding levels seems to indicate that the provincial government thinks it can seriously threaten the quality of education without facing serious opposition.

It is in this context students and others in the post-secondary community must consider our response to government action.

Students and staff, academic and non-academic, at Ryerson, York and Glendon have decided they must bring their concerns to Queen's Park

The American Friend

I must thank Martin Heavisides for correcting the 'error' in my review of Wim Wenders' The American Friend, though I am glad he did not do so before I got into print. As he says, James Dean was the rebel in Nicholas Ray's (in very sense) legendary film Rebel Without a Cause, something no one could deny even if he disputed Mr. Heavisides' estimate of Dean's acting ability.

So Dennis Hopper was not the rebel without a cause? Well in fact he was. He appeared alongside Dean as the aptly named 'Goon', and ever since his roles have taken over the Dean-Ray stereotype. Wenders' film alludes to this, as did my review. Cheers to Raymond N. Kienzle across vales of karma.

Monkeys loose

By RANDY WINTER

Vandalism has struck the Varsity once again, resulting in the distribution of two radically different editions last Friday.

The incident began late Thursday night as officials at the Metro Zoo were conducting a bed check. An alert security guard noticed that six chimpanzees had escaped, leaving hairy pillows in their place. Zookeepers expressed surprise at the breakout, describing the six chimps as "under-achievers" and "zeroes."

Police trailed paw-prints through the snow to the Varsity's plant in Scarborough. The scene there was one of mass destruction. Workers told police that they hid in the restrooms during the reign of terror to escape the "brute force."

It was not until the Varg hit the streets that it was learned that the simians had interfered with news copy halfway through the run. Against astronomically high odds, most of the changes made by the apes left real albeit vulgar, English words and an amazing 30 per cent of the sentences remained reasonably coherent.

Most students polled detected the difference between the two editions, although Engineering undergrad Tom Parks proclaimed the bogus Varg "gooder."

The Varsity wishes to apologize for this incident and any confusion resulting from it, and to announce that photos of the monkeys have been posted and that they will not be allowed into the plant a second time.

in dramatic way. Meetings of 800 people at York, 500 at Ryerson and 200 at Glendon decided to organize for a rally at Queen's Park on March 16th.

The Ontario Federation of Students, feeling that a province-wide response was required for a province-wide matter of concern, has endorsed the rally at Queen's Park on March 16th, and is actively promoting the participation of students from across Ontario in the rally.

Instead of making the final decision on whether or not SAC would endorse the demonstration, this year's SAC decided to leave the final decision to its total membership — the full-time undergraduate student body. A meeting of full-time undergraduate students has been called for Monday, March 6th; at 3 p.m., in the Medical Sciences Auditorium to decide the issue. This is no mere session for input; the final decision will be made by the students in attendance at the meeting and those that have sent their proxies.

While the SAC Board of Directors has decided to leave the ultimate decision on whether SAC will support the rally on March 16th to its total membership, we do not do so without providing a recommendation as to our advice in this matter. We feel strongly that the lack of commitment which is evident in current government policy with regard to accessibility to post-secondary education and the quality of that education cannot go without challenge. We have lobbied, we have presented briefs, we have written letters. Now, we feel that the government must be convinced that students and other members of the post-secondary community are committed in their opposition to policies which will do irreparable harm to the quality of our educational system.

The rally at Queen's Park on March 16th can be an important step in illustrating that opposition.

Pitman defends his report

By TOM CODY

Ryerson president Walter Pitman met strong opposition last Wednesday when he addressed an audience at Woodsworth College on racism in Toronto. Members of the audience took issue with his claim that most people are racist and other statements both in his speech and in his report called "Now Is Not Too Late."

Pitman said his Task Force for the report found "a very considerable existence of racial violence," and a need for attitudinal research such as that done recently by Professor Frances Henry at York University. This study also found "a high level of racism in this city," he said.

He added that his report did not try to find a "social and economic context" for racist attacks in Toronto. It was a report just to politicians on the municipal level, he said.

Racism couldn't be erased but should be brought "within tolerable limits, according to Pitman. "One person in the audience asked him what he considered a "tolerable" amount of racism.

Another participant said he did not consider himself racist nor Canadians in general racist. He criticized Pitman for conducting his study by talking with Don Andrews, former head of the Western Guard, policemen and racial attackers and generalizing their statements.

He said Pitman was purposely avoiding study of how the state promotes racist attacks through the Green Paper hearings of two years ago, Bill C-24, differential fees for foreign students, and the police force.

Pitman disagreed with the analysis saying there was no evidence of a "conspiracy" at all levels of the state.

An East Indian in the audience said Pitman didn't know East Indians beyond the stereotype of "spicy foods" and "turbans." He said Pitman was strong to typify all East Indians as timid, passive people. He said the whole community was united in its defense organization to fight back against the attacks. He charged that if Pitman were to go before the East Indian community they would throw their shoes at him, a traditional sign of disrespect.

Another speaker quoted sections of the report that said young people today are in a "vicious, reckless and ignorant state of walking mental collapse." Pitman said it was taken out of context and the two argued over whether he had generalized, from discussions with racist attackers.

A woman film-maker said she had made a film for NBC television about racism, but was "outraged by the editing" which made it quite different from what she had intended. She said she had come up with an idea for a new film but "nobody wants to touch it." The episode discouraged her from believing that individuals can do something about the problem set out in Pitman's report, he stated.

Other people complained that they could not find copies of the report. Pitman said the budget was too small to publish more than a thousand.

Sociology dept. assembly may be reinstated

By CELIA RASBACH

The return of the assembly in the Department of Sociology came one step closer to reality last Friday. At a meeting attended mainly by students, a motion was passed 26-3 in favor of reinstating the assembly.

The assembly, introduced to the Sociology department in a constitution written in 1970, is defined as the "final decision-making body on all matters of departmental policy." However, since the 1974-75 academic year, there have been no assembly meetings.

According to a position paper written by the Graduate Students in Sociology Association (GSSA), the present system of parity committees "has the effect of heightening the split between faculty and students," because, "lacking an open forum where all constituencies articulate their interests and differences of opinion, committee members are often forced to take inflexible positions representing what they see to be the majority opinion of their group."

Controversy over the assembly began when the GSSA passed a motion in November 1977 requesting that the student representatives of the executive committee, one of the department's parity committees, introduce a motion calling for an assembly. The executive committee introduced and passed the motion. Five members were in favor of re-establishing the assembly, two were against it, and one member abstained.

Department chairperson Lorna Marsden, who ratifies executive committee decisions, disregarded this vote. According to the GSSA position paper, Marsden argued that she had nothing against assembly meetings in principle, but she would like to have the faculty vote on the matter first.

At a faculty meeting held Feb. 22, the faculty voted 12-8 against restoring the assembly. In a subsequent mailed ballot to the faculty, 12 voted for the Assembly, 24 against, and four abstained.

The faculty's unwillingness to restore the Assembly has created an obstacle since they implement any decisions the assembly makes. The GSSA position paper points out, however, that no single constituency has the authority to disband the constitution. A majority vote is needed to amend the constitution, the paper states.

A special assembly meeting can be called with a petition of 20 signatures. Such a meeting will take place March 29, at which time the future of the assembly will be decided.

Film Society robbed $600 stolen from car

By STEPHEN ELLAMS

The U of T Film Society was the victim of a smash and grab robbery Friday night which netted the thieves $600.

Dan Donnelly, one of the organizers of the screenings, reported that he placed the cash box in his car, outside the Medical Sciences Auditorium, shortly after the box office closed at 11:00 p.m.

The robbery was discovered at about 1:30 a.m. when Donnelly returned to his car after the conclusion of that night's double bill

— Slapshot and The Sting.

The thieves used a brick to smash in the side window of the car and absconded with the cash box and some personal property of Donnelly's. The robbery put the film society in a delicate financial situation which was one partially rectified by the proceeds of Saturday night's screenings.

Donnelly stated that the members of the film society will have to "reach into their own pockets" to keep the society going. The robbery also scuttled the film society's plans to, as Donnelly put it, "really blow the wad on an expensive double bill" at the end of term.

The U of T police have been called into the case and will also handle the protection and transportation of future box office receipts. The film society has posted a $100 reward for information leading to the recovery of the money.

GAS summer courses cut

By BARBARA ANDREW

The East Asian Studies Student Union (EASSU) is fighting summer course cutbacks. The courses are taken by students specializing in East Asian studies to cut down on the time required for a specialists' degree and by students wishing to make up language requirements for graduate studies.

The summer courses have been sponsored for the past three years by the U of T-York Joint Centre on Modern East Asia which is partially funded by the Japanese government.

The executive committee of the Joint Centre agreed last October to cancel the summer courses because of expected heavy financial losses but did not officially announce their decision until February. The centre is instead offering five bursaries of $500 each for summer study elsewhere.

COURSES COST $5,000

Last year seven courses were offered: First, second and third-year Mandarin, first and second-year Japanese, EAS 290 (Mandarin for Cantonese speakers), and JMC 300 (China in Revolution). The language courses cost about $5,000 each; JMC 300 was about $3,000. Students taking the courses paid $130 tuition and a $125 Joint Centre fee. The balance of the expenses was paid by the Joint Centre.

$10,000 DEFICIT

The Joint Centre's deficit last year was $10,000. John Leeson, EASSU undergraduate chairman, termed it a "classic case of financial bungling."

In an effort to reinstate the summer courses, students in East Asian Studies considered raising the money themselves. They asked the executive committee for $5,000 and hoped to persuade the Japanese Consulate to match that. However the executive committee agreed to only $2,500 and insisted the courses be held at York. (Courses are held alternately at the two different universities.)

Leeson maintains that more students and instructors would attend courses held at U of T. He also said that without the summer courses students may not be able to finish their specialist degrees. Eventually the number of students will be reduced, Leeson said.

Leeson said the course union has received little support from the faculty to hold summer courses. "We're counting on doing it ourselves for next summer," he said.

Neither the Department of East Asian Studies nor the Joint Centre are offering summer courses this year or next. However, Woodsworth College is offering EAS 290. The University of British Columbia is the only other place in Canada where these courses are offered.

Student chosen by Socreds

Michael Marzolini

By ROBERT FIFE

Free education at the post-secondary level should be given to "smart people," said Michael Marzolini, recently nominated Social Credit candidate for York-East. A Political Science student at Scarborough College, he says he believes that our tuition fees aren't very high. As for the high number of unemployed graduates, Marzolini said that only a Social Credit government can create the necessary jobs.

Marzolini was elected Saturday at a party meeting held at the Donway United Church. Thirty people came to vote and listen to Ontario's Socred president Cyril Gautier denounce Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau and Quebec premier Levesque as "Communists" and to call for a free and balanced economy.

Marzolini is a strong advocate of the free enterprise system with limited government intervention. "There's too much bureaucracy," he said. "We've got to get rid of superfluous civil servants." Bureaucracy is a left-wing approach that has failed to get results, he said.

A fierce advocate of capital punishment, Marzolini feels "we've got to return to a law and order society." He admitted our marijuana laws "are too stiff" but is against legalization. Marzolini says the Socreds are a populist party which favor "what the people want."

Marzolini, concerned over nuclear proliferation, said, "It's ridiculous the way the Government is selling nuclear reactors to unstable countries like Korea and India." On bilingualism, Marzolini supports Ontario Premier Bill Davis' decision to keep Ontario unilingual.

The greater cost of his campaign will be borne by Marzolini. He hopes to "keep costs below $700 by canvassing door to door." Marzolini expects an election to be called in 60 days and is now gearing up for what promises to be a tough campaign.

CHANGES HAPPEN EVERY YEAR

Rally at Queen's Park? You decide.

Are you going to put yourself in the picture?

*CUTBACKS

The funds available to the post-secondary system for next year have just been announced. They do not come close to meeting the effects of inflation, according to even the government's own advisory body. This will mean even larger classes, fewer tutorials, further reductions in library service and higher academic incidental fees. Aging equipment will rarely be replaced, course offerings will become further restricted.

*UNEMPLOYMENT

Student proposals for expanded summer job creation, and requests for action with respect to the employment situation facing graduating students, have not received a positive government response.

*WHAT DO WE DO?

In light of these developments, University of Toronto students must now consider their future course of action. Students at York, Ryerson and Glendon have decided that the only alternative left to them is a rally at Queen's Park to show opposition to government policy. SAC has recommended to its membership that University of Toronto students endorse this action and participate in it.

But the final decision is up to you. The meeting on March 6th would allow for discussion of our response to the government, and will decide whether or not U of T students will endorse the rally at Queen's Park and work towards its success.

*STUDENT AID

Since the new student aid proposals were announced, students have negotiated with the government to make necessary improvements, those negotiations involved meetings with the Minister, Dr. Parrott, Lobby Day and culminated with the recent OFS meeting with the Cabinet. The government refuses to budge on limiting eligibility for grants, thus cutting 20% of those currently receiving grant assistance, and making graduate and professional schools accessible only to those that can afford them. As well, Dr. Parrott has refused to make public the parental contribution table, although he admits it is prepared. Could this be because the expected parental contribution will be even more unrealistic than it is now?

Men not invited to meeting

By ROBERTA CLARE

The battle of the sexes saw another brief skirmish Friday afternoon when the Students' Administrative Council (SAC) Women's Commission held an open meeting in the former male stronghold of Hart House. According to Deputy Commissioner Kate Bishop men were not encouraged to attend the meeting. The invitation to the campus community read: "What Should A Women's Group On Campus Be Doing? We invite all interested women to join us to discuss The Role of the SAC Women's Commission."

Four male SAC representatives, Brian Hill and David Jones, both vice-presidents of SAC, Brian O'Riordan (University Government Commissioner) and Doug Reid (Victoria College rep), "crashed" the meeting. Bishop explained: "There is no policy concerning male attendance at commission meetings." The presence of men is determined by the "nature of the issues at hand." Earlier in the year, she said, a man attended an informal discussion on rape. Upon the disapproval of one of the commission members he voluntarily left the meeting.

At Friday's meeting, Reid advised the commission to "co-ordinate activities among the various women's groups on campus and work with them with one or two well-defined goals in mind." Over the last two years the commission's record has improved, he said.

The "piecemeal approach" of the commission has resulted in lack of student support, Bishop maintained. "This year the Commission has been unfocused," she said.

Bishop recommended unification of campus and community groups. "We're on each others' mailing lists" but there is no direct liaison between organizations, she explained.

The Varsity — Wendy Winters

Nada Conic and Judith Thompson both did not attend SAC Women's Commission meeting. Nada knew but didn't care; Judith was not aware of the meeting.

Lady Swimmers Finish Third Behind Alberta and Acadia In National Championship

By HUGH STUART

While Acadia and Alberta were running away from their competition in the CWIAA Championships held at the Etobicoke Olympium last weekend, the real battle was between the Lady Blues and Lakehead for third spot.

Lakehead, led by stars Becky Smith and Liz MacKinnon, didn't build up a large enough lead in the first two days to withstand the onslaught of the charging Lady Blues. In the end, the two teams ended up sharing third place, with Acadia first and Alberta second.

As expected, it was Anne-Marie Latta and Karen LeGresley that led the OWIAA champion LADY Blues. Together, Latta and LeGresley had a hand in 109 of U of T's 191 points.

Latta had a busy meet as she qualified for the finals of all six events that she was entered in. She swam to a third-place finish in the 400-metre individual medley. She also added fourth place finishes in the 100 metre freestyle and the 200 metre butterfly.

LeGresley placed second in the 800-metre freestyle and third in the 200 metre freestyle.

Latta and LeGresley also did a lot of damage in the relays. They teamed up with Elaine Keith and Linda Lozowsky to finish third in the 800 metre freestyle relay. Nancy Lee joined Latta, LeGresley and Lozowsky on the second place 400 metre freestyle relay team.

The 400 metre freestyle relay was an important one. In order to at least tie with Lakehead, the team had to finish first or second. Thankfully Lakehead didn't have a team entered. The Lady Blues swimmers swam their hearts out and although they couldn't pass Alberta, they finished in a comfortable second place.

Only two other U of T women made the finals for the Lady Blues. Keith finished third in the 800 metre freestyle and Nancy Lee finished 6th in the 100 metre breaststroke.

From the showings this year, it appears that if the pair of Latta and LeGresley return next year, the Lady Blues will be able to give traditional powerhouses Acadia and Alberta a strong run for the championship.

Another Queen's Cup For Blues

By JIM O'LEARY
and HOWARD DEANE

The U of T Blues are heading to Moncton for the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union hockey finals in search of their 10th national title in the last thirteen years.

The path to Moncton was paved by a two-game sweep of their best of three series against the Sir Wilfrid Laurier Golden Hawks, which gave Toronto the Queen's Cup (emblematic of Ontario Intercollegiate hockey supremacy) for an unprecedented 19th time since 1945.

It took a goal by Toronto's Dan D'Alvise at 1:07 of the first overtime period to give Toronto a 3-2 win in the first game at Varsity Arena Friday night. Saturday, the Blues had an easier time, winning 4-1 at Kitchener's Memorial Auditorium.

The Blues were led in both games by D'Alvise. Besides his overtime goal, he also scored the tying goal on Friday and the opening goal in Kitchener on Saturday.

"We just went out and played our own game," said D'Alvise in reference to the overtime period. For the big center and his linemates Larry Hopkins and Cary Farelli, playing their own game meant controlling the puck. On the overtime goal Farelli dug the puck out of the corner and fed it to Hopkins who relayed a perfect pass to an unguarded D'Alvise in front of the net. "They did all the work. All I had to do was put it in," said D'Alvise.

The overtime was necessary because of light checking and superb goaltending by Laurier. Goaltender Al MacSorley stopped 39 shots in the Hawk net. Many of these saves were of the remarkable variety, especially a stop on Toronto's Alex Jeans who was faced with an open net with only two seconds left in the third period.

"It was great reflex action by him. I had him down but he somehow caught it," said Jeans of the last second stop.

"We had a lot of chances but had trouble putting it in the net. A goalie gets a lot more confidence when he keeps making the stops," he continued.

Defenceman Charlie Hughes, who played a solid game and delivered several solid bodychecks, felt Laurier had a good team. "They have a lot of hustle. They're sort of like York — good skaters and checkers. But you can only go so far on hustle and desire," said Hughes.

Coach Tom Watt was pleased with the defensive play of his team. In the first period they allowed only five shots on net. They let up a bit in the second and Laurier responded with two goals.

"We played pretty well except for the first 10 minutes of the second period," said Watt.

The Blues opened the scoring late in the first period on a goal by Dan Tsubouchi. He banged a rebound into the short side.

Laurier took the lead in the second on goals by Darryl Benjamin and Peter Locheade.

D'Alvise came back less than a minute later to tie the game on a solo effort. He won a faceoff and followed the puck into the crease where he stabbed it over the line before MacSorley could put his glove on it.

On Saturday the Hawks ran up against some stubborn Toronto penalty killing which continually foiled any chance of a Laurier victory.

The Blues played shorthanded for seven minutes straight in the third period. At one point they were two men short for over a minute.

"Those penalties could have turned things around but our guys played pretty well," said Watt.

Over the evening the Blues stymied every Laurier power play. To add insult to injury, Hopkins also scored a goal while Toronto was shorthanded.

The larger ice surface in Kitchener made for a more wide open game than the first of the series. Because of the Blues' abundance of skaters and scorers, the increased skating room worked to their advantage.

"We had room to skate. We were more in control tonight," said Watt. Mark Logan turned in a humdinger of an effort in his first full game in net in over two months. He made several key saves and only missed a shutout because he drew the puck into his own net.

The first period was close with the only goal coming from D'Alvise.

The Blues opened up in the second and scored three goals. The winning goal was scored after five minutes as Doug Herridge banged in his own rebound while the Blues had a man advantage. The other two goals were both scored on breakaways by Hopkins and Farelli.

The Hawks scored the only goal in the third period but it was a case of too little too late. They were noticeably tiring as the game progressed and despite outshooting Toronto, had few good scoring opportunities.

BLUES' LINES: Friday's game was a matchup of the all-star goalies from the East and West Division. Toronto's Dave Jenner won the battle with several key stops. For former Marlboro Cary Farelli, the Queen's Cup was his first championship since he played pee-wee.

Bob Adoranti dressed in place of Frank Davis in Saturday's game. It's nothing serious, Davis is just feeling a little under the weather and felt he shouldn't play if he couldn't give 100 percent. Budget cutbacks have hit the Blues. Instead of champagne they only had beer to drink from the Cup at a party after Saturday's win. So far there have been no complaints.

"It was a fabulous game and a fabulous finish. Good luck in the future." Those were the words of U of T president John Evans who dropped by to congratulate the Blues after their overtime win on Friday. The players must have been thrilled.

Watt is trying to arrange a couple of exhibition games before the team leaves for Moncton. The D'Alvise line has scored 16 of Toronto's 26 goals in their four playoff games so far. Watt is proud to say that a U of T player has not received a 10 minute misconduct for over two years. The Blues leave for the East Coast on the 15th.

Dan D'Alvise puts the puck in the net after 1:07 of the first overtime period as teammate Larry Hopkins looks on.

Waterloo Edges U of T Swimmers In Final

By HUGH STUART

Two weeks ago the Varsity Swimming Blues won the Ontario University championship by 49 points over Waterloo. In the Canadian Championships held at the Elobico Olympium last weekend, Waterloo reversed the situation and successfully defended their Canadian title — by 49 points over Toronto.

It was a strong final day that wrapped up the championship for Waterloo. Going into Saturday's programme, the Blues were leading Waterloo by 11 points, and York by 33.

Rick Madge's performance in the final of the 400 metre freestyle was one of the high points of the evening as he hung on to take second place. In the consolation final, Richard Torrance edged an Alberta swimmer to finish third and pick up four points for the Blues.

In the 50 metre freestyle there was a false start and the mechanism that was supposed to drop a line into the pool to stop the swimmers malfunctioned. U of T's Dan Thompson was one of three swimmers who were unaware of the false start and as a result swam three quarters of the race before they were stopped. In the race swim twenty minutes later, York's Gary MacDonald won while Thompson placed third.

One of the big disappointments of the meet was the failure of the U of T breaststrokers to qualify for the finals. John Watt and Rob Micheli finished third and fourth in the consolation final. But in the final, Waterloo swimmers placed one-two, to give the Warriors a 29-7 edge in the event.

Kevin Hebner swam a personal best in the 220 metre butterfly. Unfortunately he was swimming against York's Neil Harvey who broke the Canadian record for the event. Hebner took second.

John Lyall's sixth place finish in the 200 metre butterfly gave the Blues another 9 points.

Going into the diving finals, the Blues were trailing Waterloo by four points. In last year's championships, U of T found itself in a similar position. True to the script of last year, U of T was blown away in the diving competition. The Warriors picked up 37 points, the Blues zero.

After the diving there was only one event left. Although it was physically impossible to catch Waterloo in the standings, the foursome of Torrance, Phil Moore, Thompson, and Madge turned in a superb performance to place third in the 400 metre freestyle relay.

While Saturday was the crucial day, it was outstanding U of T performance in the first two days of the meet that put the Blues in the lead.

The versatile Thompson finished first in the 100-metre butterfly and second in the 100 metre freestyle behind his nemesis of the meet, York's MacDonald. In the latter race, MacDonald set a new Canadian record. Thompson also teamed up with Hebner, Watt and Mike Hibberd to win the 400-metre medley relay.

Madge, the team captain, had two third place finishes: in the 200 and 400 metre butterfly events. Last year's captain, Hibberd, was a busy competitor as he had fifth, eighth and twelfth place finishes to his credit.

In spite of their second consecutive second place finish in the CIAU's, coach Robin Campbell was happy with his team's performance. As he explains, "We needed to pick up sixty points in the diving in order to have a good shot. We only got twenty. We really swam well on the first and second days but Waterloo really swam well on the final. It was a fantastic meet, no doubt about it."

Waterloo's Dave Wilson said that his team expected a really tough meet. "We spent a long time studying the results of the O.U.'s. We were sure we could do it, but there was no doubt that it would be a close one. It was a great meet, and it really makes you feel good to beat U of T."

And so the 1977-78 season ended with a bang. Speaking over the chant of W-A-T-E-R-L-O-O, and the song "We Are The Champions", Dan Thompson was already looking ahead to next year. Says Thompson, "We're going to do some recruiting and work really hard next year. Don't worry, we'll be back."

Calculated wrong

$2 fee increase for athletics

By JIM O'LEARY

Due to miscalculations of student enrolment for the 1977-78 school year by the Internal Affairs Office, the Department of Athletics has been forced to seek a $2 fee increase for St. George campus students effective next year.

The original Department of Athletic budget, released six weeks ago, had implemented cutbacks in a number of areas but avoided requesting a fee increase. It was the department's hope that an athletic fee increase would not be needed until the completion of the Athletic Complex in 1979.

Figures released by the Internal Affairs Office three weeks ago forced a reassessment of this plan.

At this time it was revealed that because of a drop in the predicted enrolment, the university allotted the Department of Athletics $27,000 too much towards the cost of athletics for the 1977-78 school year. This money is to be paid back out of next year's athletic budget.

Furthermore, expected enrolment figures for next year were also revised to show the Department of Athletics would receive $27,000 less next year than was originally planned. Coupled with the previous miscalculation, this meant the Department of Athletics had to rewrite the budget to absorb an additional expense of $54,000 in next year's budget. The department hopes, however, to have to pay only half this debt.

According to Athletic Director Bud Fraser the only way the budget could be rewritten without cutting existing programs, was to get an athletic fee increase of $2 or get Governing Council to rescind the five percent budget decrease for next year.

Fraser said, "We've reached a stage where we can't eliminate fat. There just is not any more fat to eliminate."

"All program areas are now at a minimum position and further cuts would require drastic measures with serious consequences," he continued.

Failure to get the fee increase would, in Fraser's opinion, result in the elimination of at least one major area of the Athletic Department's program, and possibly jeopardize the jobs of some of its employees.

While the budget reduction imposed by the university is five percent, Fraser believes the Department of Athletics is actually being forced to absorb a cut of 10.5 percent. The additional five and a half percent arises out of increased costs in the areas of arena and stadium maintenance and Hart House surgery which the department was not faced with last year. These costs total $36,000.

Student Council (SAC) president John Tuzyk expressed concern that a fee increase may be implemented without enough input from the student body.

"There should be no increases in fees that students have not voted on in a campus-wide referendum. This has been SAC's policy as we have shown in our own referendum," said Tuzyk. (The SAC referendum will be held March 15 and 16.)

The fee increase received overwhelming approval of the Athletic Council, passing 11-2 with one abstention.

One dissenting voter felt the council was acting too hastily. "This has all been thrown at us tonight, without giving us a chance to get feedback from our constituents," she said.

The fee increase must be approved by the Internal Affairs Committee of Governing Council before it can be implemented. Their next meeting is March 21.

144 vote to join March 16 demo

By KATHY CANTY

A small contingent of undergraduates voted overwhelmingly in favor of U of T's participation in the March 16 demonstration against cutbacks.

The balloting took place at a general assembly meeting of the Students Administrative Council (SAC) Corporation held at the Medical Sciences Auditorium Monday. Votes were tallied at 144 in favor, 10 against, with two abstentions.

Technically, every full-time undergraduate at U of T is a member of the Corporation, and was entitled to vote at the meeting.

Although quorum was not achieved at the meeting, the General Board of Directors nonetheless decided to ratify the results of the ballot. The general meeting gave SAC the go-ahead to spend the funds allocated for the demonstration, said SAC president John Tuzyk.

At the opening of the general meeting, Tuzyk said that a mass meeting of 500 at York and 800 at Ryerson have already endorsed the demonstration. He asked for a similar show of support from U of T students.

When the floor was opened up to speakers, Michael Treacy, student governor on Governing Council, complained that there are 26,000 undergraduates at U of T, and yet "I find today that SAC can draw but 1 percent of the corporation to a meeting such as this." The poor turnout, he said, revealed that "SAC has a crisis of legitimacy." It shows that "nobody gives a goddamn about SAC."

Another student said the meeting was called because of the "cowardice and ineffectiveness of SAC." Instead of simply going ahead with the demonstration campaign, SAC had to call a meeting first, he said. "We don't need SAC's endorsement to have a demonstration." He suggested that students abstain from the vote and just show up for the protest rally March 16. This would leave SAC with "egg on its face."

Judy Brady, a first year Arts student, said the meeting "was an important thing for SAC to do because it provides a forum for students to say what they think." Although quorum was not reached it was a legitimate meeting because "the people that were there were the people who cared. People forget that for the $12 fee they are entitled to be apathetic."

Stephen Fruitman (New College II) said the meeting is the first of its type. People didn't come to it because they weren't sure about what was going to happen, he said. "The next one will be better."

Other students complained that there was no point in the meeting because it appeared that SAC had already decided that U of T should enter the demonstration.

Tuzyk said the meeting was called because "SAC wanted to broaden the spectrum of decision-making beyond SAC." He said that none of the funds set aside for the demonstration would be spent until the proposal to join the demonstration was endorsed.

Asked later why attendance at the meeting was so poor, Tuzyk said he thought the turnout was good. "I was very happy that 150 people showed up." Only 300 people came to the tuition fee hikes protest last year, said Tuzyk.

Mac students occupy office

'No' to new aid plan

By MARIO CUTAJAR

While the Trent University occupation was coming to an end yesterday another occupation was starting at McMaster University. Twenty students walked into McMaster's Student Awards office at 2:30 p.m. to protest against the proposed student aid plan.

A flyer put out by the students involved in the occupation describes the new plan as a "clear attack on accessibility" and an attempt to shift the burden of the cost of university education onto the backs of students and parents. The protesters are putting forward four demands:

- An increase in the net income figure at which parents are expected to contribute to their children's tuition costs. In the new plan parents who have a net income over $6,600 are expected to contribute. The McMaster students think this figure is too low.

- No limit to the number of years a student can receive student aid. The new plan will have an effective limit of four years.

- Independent status should be granted to students after they have been in the workforce for 12 months. The new plan requires three years in the workforce before a student can be granted independent status.

- A five-year freeze on tuition fees and the abolition of differential fees for foreign students.

The occupation is planned to last till 8:30 a.m. today, when the demonstrators will leave the awards office and set up an information table in the adjoining corridor, according to Michael Cox, one of the students. The occupation was originally planned to last 24 hours but after negotiating with the administrators the students agreed to leave at 8:30. The demonstrators have told the administration that the occupation is not directed against McMaster University but rather against the provincial government.

"Unofficially, they (the administration) support us," said Cox.

Asked what gave him the idea to occupy the awards office, Mike Hayes, one of the leaders replied, "The government, I guess. All of us are opposed to things like occupations because they usually lead to violence but in this case it worked."

Hayes said that the protest was directed against the awards office so as not to disrupt the university. "We wanted to win their support," he said. The protesters are also looking for support from student councils in Ontario.

A spokesman for the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) said that OFS agreed with the McMaster students' criticisms of the new aid program but that the organization leaves it to those involved to determine what tactics to use.

The McMaster University administration was not available for comment.

Editor elected

From failing hands the torch was thrown on Monday night to George Cook, a Varsity staffer who has Made Good.

Cook, a two-year Varsity reporter, won a hard-fought election to emerge as the first on the Varsity masthead for 1978-79.

The editor-elect, who said he will add "a certain je-ne-sais-quoi" to the newspaper, won by a vote of 40-33 over his opposition.

Cook immediately promised "in-depth coverage of the campus pubs and hangouts" for the paper next year. He also said he would shift the focus of The Varsity to squash tournaments across the country.

Athletics gets axed

By JIM O'LEARY

As had been anticipated, the axe fell with a resounding thud on the budget at the Athletic Department. Passed by the Athletic Council last night, the budget reflects the cutbacks which have hit the entire university.

On the instruction of the university, the athletic department was forced to cut five percent from last year's budget making it one of the most severely hit areas at the university.

As well as this cut, the Athletic Department was also forced to shoulder expenses which in the past were the responsibility of other departments. The cost of Hart House Surgery and Arena and Stadium maintenance were added to the department, giving them an accumulative cutback of 10.5 percent.

Hardest hit is the area of intercollegiate sports. A decrease of over $22,000 will mean that some intercollegiate sports currently sponsored by the department will probably be dropped. Indications are that it will likely be sports which solicit slight participation such as golf, tennis and squash.

The budget of the instruction division is also hard hit with a decrease of almost $16,000. Most of this money will come from a cutback in part-time salaries which will probably result in fewer instructors next year.

The budget of the recreation department shows a slight increase but intramural hockey teams will have to pay more of the cost for practise time at Varsity Arena.

The biggest decrease comes in the budget of the Administration. A whopping $31,000 has been chopped in an effort to preserve as many of the existing programs as possible.

Gov. Con. Drop-outs

Frank Pegolo, a candidate for the full-time undergraduate student seat on Governing Council (Constituency I), announced yesterday that he is dropping out of the race. His withdrawal, along with that of James Hawken last week, has left the two seats filled by acclamation: Jules Bloch and Don Guloien will sit in this constituency next year. The Varsity will interview these acclaimed candidates Thursday.

Blow-by-blow battle over Grad Post

By ANDREW MAHON

This Friday a three-man Canadian University Press (CUP) commission will release a preliminary report on its investigation concerning Grad Post editor Maria Horvath.

The report is a result of hearings conducted by the commission which is looking at circumstances stemming from a Jan. 23 letter from the Graduate Students Union (GSU) executive stating that Horvath had "failed to fulfill the responsibilities of the Grad Post editor as outlined in the editor's job description and that continued failure to fulfill those responsibilities will be grounds for eventual dismissal."

The letter sparked a controversy which has involved CUPE Local 1281 (Horvath's Union), the GSU executive and Canadian University Press (CUP). Concern over the action taken by the GSU executive has provoked comments from Graduate Association of Political Science Students president Tom Kuhn and former Ontario CUP fieldworker Gord Graham over the handling of the GSU's difficulties with Horvath and ultimately "freedom of the press."

According to the GSU's letter of Jan. 23, Horvath had failed to fulfill her responsibilities including the production of the Grad Post and preparation and administration of the Grad Post budget.

Specific charges in the warning letter ranged from "failure to publish a bi-weekly paper of a minimum of eight pages," to failure to cover "important news events within the university," to lack of photographs and misuse of the Xerox machines.

The letter also charged that "the executive committee has determined through investigation that parties owing monies to the Grad Post for advertisement have not even received notice of the amounts due to the Grad Post much less been asked to clear accounts."

In a meeting with the GSU executive on Jan. 27, Horvath presented a brief which answered the charges made against her in the warning letter.

In her brief Horvath called the warning letter totally unnecessary. She said: "There are many avenues open to executive members if they wish to criticize or praise the organization and the content of the Grad Post."

Horvath also refuted the charges levelled against her in the GSU

Trent sit-in ends, Que. demo busted

By GEORGE COOK

Seven students who occupied the office of the comptroller at Trent University last Friday morning after a night of talks with the acting president of Trent, Marion Frye.

Frye agreed that no legal action would be taken if the students left the comptroller's office peacefully.

Of the seven demands made by the students only one was agreed to. The Trent Senate decided to close the university March 16 to allow students to participate in the Queen's Park anti-cutbacks demonstration.

Students in other parts of the country have also engaged in occupations and demonstrations recently in opposition to Government cutbacks in education spending.

In Montreal last week about 400 students walked through downtown streets to the office of Quebec Premier Rene Levesque. They were demanding an end to educational funding cuts in Quebec.

At the end of February two students' occupations of CEGEP Vieux Montreal were broken up by police.

In Lethbridge, Alberta, a 325-mile motorcade to Calgary is being planned for March 15 by the Federation of Alberta Students (FAS). The federation is asking for a freeze on tuition fees and an investigation of post-secondary education funding.

At the University of Regina, 40 students occupied a board of governors meeting room, March 2, to argue against possible tuition fee increases and education cutbacks. Later the board decided to raise tuition fees 8.2 per cent and incur a $100,000 university deficit in the coming year.

The tuition increase would be the third in three years for Regina students.

In the Maritimes petitions were circulated opposing cutbacks. A thousand signatures had been gathered by Feb. 28 in both Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

Funds for fight against fees increase granted

By KATHY CANTY

Students wishing to launch a campaign against the Students' Administrative Council (SAC) fee hike scheduled for September 1979 can apply to a new committee established by the Board of Directors at their meeting Monday.

Whether or not fees are increased from $12 to $16 depends on the results of a referendum to be held March 15 and 16. The committee will have $500 to allocate to the "no" vote campaign. Student governor Michael Treacy is chairman of the committee.

Treacy came forward at the meeting with the proposal for the establishment of the committee. Treacy said he is opposed to a fee hike because as the general meeting of the Corporation (Monday afternoon) demonstrated there is a crisis in the legitimacy of SAC. SAC president John Tuzyk said the establishment of this committee is the "fairest and most equitable" way of allocating the $500.

Tuzyk added, however, that he strongly endorsed the fee hike.

Varg hears complaint

By ANDREW MAHON

In another brief presented to the Varsity Committee on Monday evening, Graduate Student Union (GSU) vice-president Leo Casey accused The Varsity of "a campaign of yellow journalism."

In presenting the two-page brief, Casey objected to two stories printed in The Varsity describing a GSU meeting and also disclosing the minutes of an earlier closed GSU executive meeting.

The brief insists that the article describing the GSU meeting was inaccurate and "distorted the general tenor of the meeting." The brief also alleges that the story concerning the minutes of a closed GSU executive meeting was compiled with the help of materials removed from a desk of the vice-president of the GSU. According to the brief "The Varsity reporter who wrote the story thus received stolen materials."

The final paragraph of the brief states that the Varsity Committee "must now decide whether or not it is willing to allow the Varsity to be used for such a campaign, a campaign of the worst type of 'yellow journalism.'"

No motions were raised by the Varsity Committee.

Visa graduate students' assistantships may be cut off

By CHARLES MEISTER

The federal government is seriously considering restricting foreign graduate students from teaching and research assistantships at Canadian universities. It may also possibly reclassify them "simply as foreign workers."

A telegram sent Feb. 20 from Claude Thibault, executive director of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada (AUCC), to Clifford Pitt, director of the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE), reveals that the Department of Employment and Immigration "has in mind" ending (the) exemption from foreign faculty hiring procedures for foreign graduate students and changing their status.

The telegram also requests Pitt to provide the number of foreign and Canadian graduate students registered at OISE and of those holding teaching and research assistantships "to enable AUCC to hold immediate discussions with E and I."

Thibault said yesterday in a phone interview from Ottawa, "We are trying to get a relaxation of those rules" proposed by the Department of Employment and Immigration.

Thibault said that under the federal department's proposed rules, visa students could only attend universities and follow courses dictated to them by the Government. Movement from one university to another would also be subject to Governmental approval and a foreign student desiring a position as an assistant would require departmental permission.

Thibault added that negotiations now under way between the AUCC and the Government could last from "six weeks to six months." He explained, "We are not sure how fast the department wants to move," since the federal department is awaiting feasibility reports from all of its offices.

Andrew Effrat, assistant co-ordinator of graduate studies at OISE said yesterday that for many research and teaching assistants "the award is the major way universities give support to graduate students."

Effrat said such a policy "would be a tragic thing" and said "we value having foreign students here." He asserted that it would be a "shortsighted conception to set Canadian versus visa students off that way."

Allan Golombek, information officer of the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS), expressed his association's total opposition to the proposal. He said it would render Canada's universities "more parochial," and that it would "close doors to foreign students" and "isolate our Canadian students."

Jeannie Greatbatch, business agent for the U of T Graduate Assistants Association (GAA) stated, "They assured us that they (the present legislation) weren't going to be changed."

Peter Gallus, GAA fieldworker, warned that this measure would be "incredibly drastic. It would cut out a whole level of experience." He feared it would also result in a decrease in the quality of university education. He speculated that if approved, the new legislation will be a purely "political move" for the federal Government.

Gallus said the Government is concerned with cutting budgets and winning public support especially in a potential election year. Gallus expressed concern that the Ontario and federal Government's policies seem to be headed in the same direction, whereas other provinces are resisting actions like the differential fee increase.

Dr. Edward Monahan, executive director of the Council of Ontario Universities, said there were approximately 14,460 graduate students in Ontario last year of which 2,460 were visa students. The number of graduate students acting as research or teaching assistants in that year was 8,920, of which 1,600 were visa students. The figures for 1977-78 are unavailable at present, he said.

The girders for the gymnasium roof of the athletic complex have been erected.

GASPS & the Grad Post

As a graduate student in political science concerned about the activities of his course union, I was dismayed to see a recent letter by Tom Kuhn, President of GASPS (Graduate Association of Students in Political Science) appearing in your paper. This letter conceals more than it discloses. There are two facts hidden by the publication of the letter itself. First, Tom Kuhn was not authorized to send such a letter to the Varsity though he was authorized to send it to the G.S.U. Executive. Secondly, the GASPS Executive had not authorized Mr. Kuhn to invite a representative of Ontario Regional Canadian University Press (ORCUP) to the G.S.U. Council.

More importantly, Mr. Kuhn's actions on this matter have been ad hoc, personalistic and undemocratic. His attempt to involve the Executive of GASPS in this matter is a prime example of just such an attitude. The decision of the GASPS Executive to involve our association in a labour-management dispute was influenced by Mr. Kuhn's biased and one-sided attitude on the "issue" and his determination to keep the totality of facts out of their hands. Here are some of the details I have been able to unearth:

1) According to two GASPS executive members, Mr. Kuhn entered an Executive meeting of GASPS about a week before the General Council Meeting of the G.S.U. with personal letters, some at least of an official nature, between Leo Casey, Vice-President of the G.S.U. and Maria Horvath, Editor of the Grad Post. These were printed on official G.S.U. stationery and had been xeroxed and offered for distribution to GASPS Executive Members.

2) Mr. Kuhn then sought a strong statement against the G.S.U. Executive on the basis of "Freedom of the Press" being violated and offered the above mentioned personal and official letters as "proof" of his allegations.

3) The Executive, sensing there was more to this than met their eyes and realizing the incomplete information upon which they were being asked to make their decision, decided to send a reasonable letter of concern about "freedom of the press" to the G.S.U. executive.

4) The regular delegates to the G.S.U. Council could not make the February 22, G.S.U. Council Meeting. Mr. Kuhn had himself selected as delegate by the Executive, which is legitimate in itself. However, he failed to tell them that he was personally involved in the case and very biased which is, at best, bad judgement on his part.

After that point, Mr. Kuhn went on a personal crusade in Council and outside of it attacking the G.S.U. executive, claiming that they had violated "freedom of the press". He has a right to his personal opinions, but his representation of these individual actions as GASPS policy exceeded his delegated authority. The GASPS executive had not decided that "freedom of the press" had been violated.

Meanwhile, Mr. Kuhn continues to deny GASPS Executive Members full access to points of view that contradict his own. I have personally spoken to two executive members who wanted to have an executive meeting with members of the G.S.U. executive who are members of GASPS. One of these G.S.U. executive members is a former officer of GASPS. Yet Mr. Kuhn, apparently fearful that his personal control over access to information might be jeopardized, unilaterally vetoed such meeting.

Furthermore, Mr. Kuhn has a petition circulating which refers to the G.S.U. Executive as a "small political group" and states that the petitions are available in room 2042 s.s., which is the GASPS office. This would suggest that such a petition represents GASPS policy. Meanwhile, GASPS rank and file members do not even know that such a petition exists and is being circulated from their office. Apparently, Mr. Kuhn did not get his way at the only G.S.U. Council meeting he has attended since the initial October meeting and plans to use GASPS as an instrument for his own personal vendetta. At this time, Mr. Kuhn refuses to call a general meeting of GASPS to discuss the issues or to explain his actions.

Now, one wonders why Mr. Kuhn has continued to deny to the executive full access to information necessary to make a well informed decision. Additionally, if this really is the burning issue Mr. Kuhn claims it is, then why has he refused to call a general meeting of GASPS so that we could democratically discuss the issue with all the facts before us in order that we might rationally decide what is the best course of action for GASPS to follow? Instead, Mr. Kuhn has gone ahead on behalf of GASPS to lobby G.S.U. council members claiming that his personal position is our course union position. He persists in this activity up to the writing of this letter.

But while Mr. Kuhn wantonly attacks the G.S.U. Executive for not being open-handed (despite the fact that it is involved in the process of a labour-management dispute governed by the confidentiality of the grievance procedure — a procedure meant to protect the employee), he is systematically attempting to deny democratic discussion and open access to information within his own organization. Kuhn's use of our association to meet his personal whims exhausts energy that GASPS might better use to address issues that vitally affect our interests. Additionally, his undemocratic activity and the shady garnering of personal letters only serves to lower the respect our association has with the faculty and with other course unions. Mr. Kuhn, before attempting to "clean up" the G.S.U., clean up your own act.

Women

The cutbacks now hitting students especially hit women. Jobs are more scarce for women students, whether to finance their education or after they graduate. The new OSAP regulations, bad for all students, discriminate against women. Among staff and faculty, women are the first laid off — half the women teachers at York are to be let go.

March 8, International Women's Day, calls for women to take up the struggle against all forms of exploitation and oppression. Started in 1908 around the struggle of New York garment workers for the 8-hour day, March 8 shows us the key role women play in the fight of the whole working class against the capitalist system that keeps women in an unequal position.

For socialism is the only solution facing women, men and students. Only with the bourgeoisie thrown out of power, will there be full and guaranteed education for the masses of men and women, and will their knowledge serve society as a whole. Also the rights of women, daycare, equal pay, etc. and particularly the right to work, will be protected.

This is completely different to the situation now. Even though we are in the midst of an economic crisis, corporation profits are up over 16 per cent from last year. But for most, capitalism means unemployment, cutbacks and, for women, inequality.

This can change. We students have to unite with the working class and clearly aim the struggle at the main enemy, the Canadian bourgeoisie. And we must build the communist party necessary to lead our battles and the struggle to smash capitalism once and for all.

It is in this spirit in which we should celebrate International Women's Day this year.

Jamaican deportations

In the past two weeks or so the Canadian government has been trying to deport nine Jamaican women on the grounds that when they applied to come to Canada — five to ten years ago — they concealed the fact that had dependent children back in Jamaica.

As a Feb. 14 Toronto Star editorial says "Canadian officials in Jamaica were fully aware that most of the women applying to come to Canada had dependent children whether they admitted it or not."

To protest these deportations and publicize the struggle of the nine Jamaican women a forum is being held on Wednesday at 3.00 at the International Student Centre. All students are welcome.

Job crisis a fraud

The so-called job crisis facing students upon graduation calls for some interpretation. Up to now it has had a conservative effect — more over-crowding on the approaches to traditionally safe career paths in law, commerce, med and dentistry, deep questioning of the value of a general arts or science degree, others deciding against a university education altogether, while on campus a disturbing quietude prevails. But all the hepped-up employment anxiety just may backfire. Traditionally, students have resisted scarce tactics and obedience training to number among the establishment's most cogent critics.

Society as a whole has never been richer nor used more scientific knowledge than now. To build upon what we have will require, it stands to reason, much more development of the higher mind and a more and more well educated populace. There will always be an urgent need for young people with clear minds, humane instincts, and the force of conviction capable of achieving beyond the shortcomings of their forebears.

The outlook facing a society's youth is certainly one indicator of the society's confidence in its future and in itself. Today, 50 percent of the unemployed are under age 30. This is a structural problem, as is the fact that approximately two-thirds of the inmates of provincial prisons are in the same age grouping.

That the shallow, wasteful, disposable consumer society has an uncertain future is also to be seen in its treatment of the elderly who are handily packaged for longer shelf life away from meaningful participation. Instead of ecological communities we have an interlocking market system in commodities that manipulates both the natural environment and isolated individuals for the profit requirements of national and international capital. That youth and the elderly are forcibly being denied access to the ruling way of life only adds up the sum of a linear and self-negating system both anti-ecological and anti-community.

The contribution that a good university education could make toward strategies for change has never been greater. Not surprisingly, our leaders are promoting cutbacks. In opting for short-term jobs and expedient election year booms, they have allowed the economy to decline to the status of a branch-plant and, now that it's poised to regress further — to the warehouse level, the pragmatism accompanying such opportunism sees little need for independent Canadian scientific research and development. Equally, in a scenario of worsening economic stagnation and dependency, those in power may well want a timid, ignorant, depoliticized populace where the fires of freedom and progress have been safely banked. Cutbacks to universities are likely to be the coming thing.

It's time that youth and the aged banded together. It's time to pressure those in control for less grandiose yet more joyful and life-sustaining ways of using and returning the means of life, for sharing work and sharing ideas.

Sure, there is a job shortage from the point of view of government, most employers, most economists, and, unfortunately, most of the currently unemployed, though here too some of the waste-makers and authoritarians will disagree. But there is never a shortage of important jobs in need of doing. It's up to us to see they get done, and first, the log-jams must be cleared.

Political Economy

Mahkno vs Bolsheviks

In a letter entitled "Trotsky and the State" (Varsity, 27 Feb), Jim Mayor takes exception to the Trotskyist League's defense of the role of Leon Trotsky in the Russian Revolution (Varsity, 24 Feb). Mayor's own political viewpoint is not clear from his letter, but to fuel his fire against the Trotskyist League he raises two of the timeworn favorites used by anarchists, Mensheviks, anti-Leninists, liberals and reactionaries of all sorts in their attacks on the Russian Revolution — namely the Kronstadt rebellion of 1921, and the Kulak feifdom of Mahkno's peasant army. Trotskyists have had to struggle for years against the lies of the capitalists, anarchists and Stalinists, and the scientific method of revolutionary Marxism is well equipped to deal with historical falsifications.

After several years of war, the Russian economy had been devastated. Much of the industry that existed even in Czarist times was destroyed. One of the most pressing tasks facing the new workers government was the basic one of feeding the urban population, necessitating the requisition of food from the countryside. This inflicted economic hardship upon layers of the peasantry, who had just been liberated by the Bolsheviks from the ruthless exploitation of the landlords.

During this period there were a number of isolated uprisings of the peasants, usually led by anarchists, Social Revolutionaries or others hostile to the Soviet Regime. It was necessary for the defense of the revolutionary workers state to build a strong, centralized army and quell these challenges to its authority. Both the Kronstadt rebellion and Mahkno's army must be seen in this light.

Before and during the October days, the Kronstadt sailors had been a bastion of revolutionary militancy and heroism. By 1921, however, these sailors were no longer at Kronstadt. Their selfless dedication to the socialist cause had been required at the fronts of the Civil War and in the local Soviets throughout the country. What remained behind, and what they had been replaced with, were largely demoralized elements, drawn mostly from the peasantry, or new workers with many ties to the villages. The Kronstadt sailors of 1921 were unwilling to make the sacrifices necessary to consolidate the revolution. The uprising was dictated by a desire to get privileged food rations. The sailors had cannon and battleships. All the reactionary elements, in Russia as well as abroad, immediately seized upon this uprising. The white emigres demanded aid for the insurrectionists. The victory of this uprising could bring nothing but a victory of counter-revolution.

Kronstadt, an island fortress, across from Petrograd was militarily important. It had to be secured. The Bolsheviks tried to do this, first through negotiation, and then through ultimatum. When their hand was forced by the pressure of events, they correctly and bravely set out to suppress the rebellion.

Mayor goes on to wail about Trotsky's role in putting down the Mahkno movement. The adventurer Mahkno created a cavalry of peasants who supplied their own horses — not the downtrodden village poor whom the Revolution had first awakened, but the strong and well-fed peasants who were afraid of losing what they had. Mahkno fought against all forms of central authority, thus when the Red Army was carrying out a life and death struggle against the white counter-revolutionaries he attempted to carry on an independent policy. With imperialist encirclement and reactionary hostility on all sides, the workers needed a dependable, centralized military force. The Red Army was forced to disarm the Mahkno army and extend itself into the Ukraine.

Mayor in his tirade against "Red" bosses, like Mahkno and the anarchists, makes a mechanical equation between the proletarian state and capitalist state. The power of both kinds of states is invested in special bodies of armed men. But the proletarian state, as an instrument of class rule and suppression, is not identical to the capitalist state or previous states. While these are based on ruling classes representing a privileged minority, the proletarian state represents the propertyless majority. While previous states served to perpetuate class rule, the proletarian state was constructed as the bridge to the elimination of class rule. The bourgeoisie will not give up without a fight, nor will it disappear immediately after a socialist revolution. It will try to overturn the gains made by the proletariat, either through military intervention from the outside, or through attempts at internal counter-revolution. To defeat these attempts the workers must have the state weapon at their disposal.

The Bolsheviks, unlike various misleaders of the working class, understood this. They did not rely upon some moral force, but built an army. The architect of the Red Army was Leon Trotsky. It was one of his greatest achievements. Without Trotsky's Red Army, the Civil War would have resulted in a victory for the White Guards, and a return to the darkest reaction.

STAFF, STUDENTS, AND PUBLIC CORDIALLY INVITED

GIVE SAC
$4.00 MORE...

ARE YOU CRAZY!

7 LEVEL HEADED REASONS WHY YOU SHOULD

(1) Why does SAC need a $4.00 fee increase?

(1) The SAC fee of $12.00 has not gone up since 1968. Prices have. SAC is doing a lot more things for a lot more people than it was doing in 1968.

Our SAC fees are the lowest university student council fees in Ontario. Even with the proposed increase, our fees will still be the second lowest in the province.

(2) But, I thought SAC had lots of money in the bank.

(2) Yes, that's true. And we have been using that money up. We have not gone to you to vote on permission to increase the fee, instead we have been falling back on our surplus. That is now coming to an end.

(3) Isn't there somewhere else to get the money from?

(3) So as to increase our revenues, SAC charges for Pubs, Riding Stables, the Directory, Caps and Gowns, Roam Arounds, Ski Days, ads in the Handbook, and we have even been forced to raise the price of pop to 20 cents at our downtown office. But still it is not nearly enough. SAC is a non-profit organization that receives the bulk of its money from the students it represents.

(4) SAC probably just wastes our money on administrative diddling around.

(4) Three years ago, the percentage of the SAC budget spent on administrative expenses was 25%. This past year it was 22%. Most student councils in Ontario have administrative and executive expenses that take up over 30% of their budgets.

(5) I don't like how SAC spends my money now.

(5) Good. Change it! SAC does a lot of things and tries to serve a very wide variety of interests. But if you want to see new things offered or old things discontinued, our student council is designed to facilitate such changes. But first, SAC must stay afloat.

(6) When does the fees increase go into effect and why?

(6) The increase will become effective in September of 1979. Our long-range estimate is that we have enough money to carry us through until then.

(7) What will happen if SAC doesn't get the increase it is asking for?

(7) Starting next year there will have to be dramatic reductions in our activities and services if SAC does not receive the fees increase. Demands for new programs would not be able to be met. SAC would cease to be an effective vehicle for defending and serving your interests.

warning letter. With regard to content and format of the paper Horvath said that "these charges make two points very clear. One, the executive is attempting to control the size, format and content of the Grad Post. Two, the executive is clearly not qualified to make either aesthetic or journalistic judgements regarding the publication of a newspaper."

Horvath concluded her statement by saying she had "merely touched upon some of the major interferences on the part of the graduate executive members in the publication of the Grad Post. If necessary, I am prepared to catalogue additional such abuses and I fully intend to do so in the face of any continued efforts by the executive members to interfere with my work as Grad Post editor."

On Feb. 13 Horvath received her second letter of warning.

The letter, written on behalf of the GSU executive, was signed by GSU vice-president Leo Casey. Horvath was advised that she "had not treated the Jan. 23 letter as such an official notification and you (Horvath) have not taken proper measures to correct the problems cited in that letter. Both of these failures have occurred despite the efforts of the Graduate Students Union to assist you in the correction of these problems."

Casey stated in the letter that Horvath's "reaction" to the first letter of warning had been to compound the problem cited in the Jan. 23 letter. The letter concludes by reiterating the warning of Jan. 23: "Your continued failure to fulfill your responsibilities, as well as continued actions such as listed above can only lead to your dismissal from your job."

A CUP investigation procedure was initiated at Horvath's request after she received the second warning letter.

In a Feb. 15 letter to Ontario Regional Canadian University Press (ORCUP) president Eric McMillan, CUP president Susan Johnson officially called for the three-man commission to investigate "any violations of the CUP statement of principles that may have been made by the GSU's letter of warning and subsequent actions regarding the content of the newspaper, The Grad Post."

The commission was also designed to "examine the present relationship between the newspaper, the Grad Post, the student union and GSU and develop a healthy working relationship between these bodies."

On Feb. 19 Horvath appeared before an ORCUP conference to outline the charges made against her by the GSU executive. At the end of her report, ORCUP unanimously passed a motion endorsing the Grad Post's call for a CUP investigation commission and warned that "any action taken against Horvath before the investigation commission's findings were made known would be viewed as highly reprehensible and would be firmly opposed by the region."

After the article appeared in the Feb. 20 edition of the Varsity, the GSU executive requested a meeting with the Varsity Committee to make a formal complaint against the story. A brief presented to the committee contended that the article violated the guidelines of journalistic ethics set out by the CUP code of ethics.

On Feb. 22, the controversy surrounding Horvath was raised before the GSU executive during a tense five-hour meeting of GSU members.

The GSU at the time of the meeting was actively involved in a grievance procedure with CUPE local 1281 on behalf of Horvath concerning the charges levelled against her. Because of the nature of the grievance procedure now in effect between the local and management, both union representative Peter Gallus and Casey insisted that only questions of procedure could be discussed.

However, in the Feb. 27 edition of The Varsity, information was presented which suggested that the idea of "confidentiality" surrounding the Horvath affair was introduced at a closed meeting of the GSU executive on Jan. 27.

After the article was published, the GSU requested another meeting with the Varsity committee which was held Monday.

Meanwhile, the future of Horvath and the Grad Post remains uncertain. According to Casey, the GSU executive will await the findings of the CUP commission before meeting again with the union.

"The CUP investigation will finish on Thursday or Friday," stated Casey, in a telephone interview yesterday. "The executive plans to meet upon a course of action and then meet with the union as part of the grievance procedure."

The CUP commission is "proceeding quite well" according to chairman Mark King, Atlantic Bureau Chief for the CUP National executive. The hearings will be concluded by Wednesday.

UTFA for Mar 16 rally

The U of T Faculty Association (UTFA) has agreed to give financial support to the anti-cutbacks rally at Queen's Park, March 16.

Jean Smith, UTFA president, declined to name the sum, but said the association's executive voted at a Monday meeting to give "a modest contribution in keeping with other campus organizations."

He also said that a mailing to the 2,500 U of T faculty members will be conducted by UTFA executive member Peter Fitting. The mailing, encouraging faculty to endorse the March 16 protest, was not raised at the Monday meeting but Smith said that "he (Fitting) is certainly welcome to use the facilities of UTFA."

James Ham: new president faces ol

By Kathy Canty

No one expects James Ham's term as the tenth president of U of T to be an easy one. In an age of cutbacks, dropping enrolment, and staff militancy, the prestigious appointment could become a political bombshell for the 57 year old engineering professor.

Ham himself confesses that he has many apprehensions and second thoughts about the job. His ability to withstand the conflict is one of his main worries. "I'm not the young man John Evans is," said Ham.

But the university is actually returning to more "normal times" after a period of tremendous growth, according to the incoming president. It is an opportunity to seek a "reaffirmation of the purpose and role" of the institution. "The virtue of tough times is refining our sense of ourselves."

Ham is bringing to his new job a schematic vision of U of T. He regards this institution as a set of four concentric circles. At the outside are the vocational schools, law, dentistry, medicine and so on. Working inwards are the social sciences, the physical and life sciences, and finally at the core are the humanities. Here individuals are actively engaged in the search for meaning. Here, according to Ham, is where the university fulfills its main function, to develop in people a critical approach to the "human situation."

What this means in practical terms is difficult to glean from Ham's conversation. The university must maintain an "intelligent balance" in its courses, he says. Although students are now pressing to get into more "job-worthy" courses, U of T should not leave its academic programs by the wayside, lest the university forget its purpose, according to Ham.

Two months ago, while John Evans was riding high as the darling of the media, the Globe and Mail published a biting editorial on Ham's views about the role of the university. The article was based on some comments Ham made shortly after his appointment as president. "I was flabbergasted that they'd pick out six words and hammer you." Asked if he thought the editorial was unfair, he replied "no more unfair than is characteristic of the Globe and Mail."

To a large extent cutbacks will govern if and how Ham's vision of U of T operates over the next few years. The report of the Budget Committee revealed last week that while the Consumer Price Index is currently rising at 9.5 per cent, the increase in government spending is only 5.8 per cent. With tuitions frozen, the effective increase in university funding is only 4.8 per cent.

Some student leaders at U of T fear that Ham won't take a strong stand against cutbacks.

"The public priority has put the university at a lower priority," according to the income president. In a period of retrenchment, spending in some areas has to be reduced, and the university is simply one of those areas, he said. Ham does not want U of T to take a short term approach to fighting cutbacks. We must have a sense of the "dynamic" of society and the economy, he added.

Ham is also opposed to deficit funding, feeling that it would sink the university into hopeless debt in no time.

He does, however, feel that the

"A university education must be founded on a linguistic education."

university should derive more of its resources from the private sector. Ham suggested that private funding helps the university maintain some autonomy from the government. "We are fundamentally an institution of the state," he said,

"but we mustn't be an instrument of the state."

Ham also favors the idea of funding by excellence. "It's a good idea to have a difference in funding, at least in Graduate Studies." But it is difficult to establish the basis upon which quality should be decided, said Ham. He feels, however, that some attempt should be made to rate the quality of both graduate and undergraduate programs at the various universities.

But, whatever steps are taken to offset the financial crisis, chances are that money will be in short supply over the next few years. Already this has had a damaging effect upon relations between the faculty and the administration at this university. Salary and benefits negotiations between the two parties took a turn for the worse recently when Simcoe Hall rejected a number of the proposals recommended by the mediator, Daniel Soberman of Queen's University.

Ham has kept out of the dispute altogether, and cautiously refuses to comment on it. But he was willing to offer some of his views on tenure. Some forecasters are predicting a decline in enrolment. "If the university shrinks it's got to shrink in an equitable shape." This means cuts in both tenured and non-tenured staff.

Ham, an engineer, is a popular choice for president among a faculty

Coboconck boy makes good

By KATHY CANTY

James Ham's biography reads like the North American folk tale of the small town boy who made good in the big city. Having spent his boyhood in Coboconk, Ontario, Ham went on to attain the highest grades ever bestowed upon an engineering student at U of T.

During the war he served in the Royal Canadian Navy, and later earned his Master and Doctor of Science Degrees from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

In 1963, he returned to U of T as an associate professor of electrical engineering, and in 1964 he became the Chairman of the Department of Electrical Engineering. His academic and administrative background also includes Dean of the Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering (1966-73), Chairman of U of T's Research Board (1974-1976), and Dean of the School of Graduate Studies (1976-78).

Ham concedes that he is reluctant to leave the School of Graduate Studies. The pressures in the job are not great because it is "not a budgetary centre," he said.

Asked if he enjoys administrative work, Ham replied: "I like working with people, but I don't like pushing paper. The image I have of the university is an image of persons, of staff and students. I hope I have no sense of power and authority."

In 1974 Ham took sabbatical leave to serve as chairman of the Ontario Royal Commission on the Health and Safety of Workers in Mines. His controversial report called for legislation to improve working conditions in the province's mines. It helped to give him a reputation for being both a humanitarian and a liberal.

This may seem surprising in an engineer, but generally Ham appears to take a rather philosophical approach to things. "There is an unease within our affluence about what we've created for ourselves." Despite our wealth, modern society suffers from such problems as pollution and alienation, he said.

This "sense of unease is projected on to the private sector of society," according to Ham. It is the source of "an anti-business" attitude among students.

In addition to his academic and administrative background, Ham has been on the executive of both the National Research Council of Canada and the International Federation on Automatic Control. He helped to establish the University's Institute for the History and Philosophy of Science and Technology and sat on the Board of Governors of George Brown College of Applied Arts and Technology.

Ham has also authored technological publications and textbooks.

The Toronto Globe and

which has felt alienated by Evans' detached efficiency. But if Evans is the cool bureaucrat, Ham is the kindly patriarch.

In the past Ham seems to have rejected the powerful role given to the president in Jack Macdonald's External Review of Governing Council. During the interview with The Varsity, however, he did not react unfavorably to the idea. "I think it's a possible thing," he said, adding that the role of the president would not be very different under Macdonald's recommendations from what it is at present.

There is "a lot of academic grass roots dissatisfaction with the Governing Council system. It is perceived not to provide adequate representation for the wisdom of the staff," Ham agreed with Macdonald that the representation of the faculty should be increased on the committees of Governing Council. He also said that much more power should be devolved to the faculties and colleges of the university.

When the Governing Council system began, it was seen as a great step towards democratization, according to Ham. There was a tendency to see the administration as simply the servant of the elected body. "We have to have leadership," The administration is "not there to do the bidding of democratic procedure."

Just as he feels that the administration should figure more in the government of this university, Ham believes that it should take a stronger hand in the curriculum of each student. Although students should be free to study what they want, they should be required to "encounter something specific," said Ham. Students should have to go beyond introductory courses, he added.

An English proficiency test is a "sad remedial test after the horse is stolen. I don't believe in proficiency tests," said Ham. He sees them, however, as a symptom of one of the problems with undergraduate education.

Ham says the university has deserted its commitment to a disciplined curriculum. "A university education has to be founded on a linguistic education," according to the incoming president. He feels that this should apply equally to students in all the departments.

Ham said he found students today "active, interested and bright." Often he says, a professor will find one or two students in a class brighter than he or she is. "Students in the fifties had a natural sense that all was going to be well." Today, however, they are suffering from a "hell of a lot of puzzlement."

This "puzzlement" is general throughout the university, according to Ham. "The whole institution is apathetic about its purposes," he said, returning to a favorite theme.

Perhaps, then, with his schematic vision of the university Ham is one step ahead of everyone else. Another thing he has in his favor is an understanding of the importance of appearances. He has asked, for example, not to live in the president's residence in Rosedale. Today the home stands in high relief to the restraint forced upon all other sectors of the university.

vargfeature

"It's a lovely place, but symbolically it makes sense for the president not to be living in a place that amounts to mansion, said Ham. The residence is useful for social functions, but it would be "more healthy" to bring people together on campus, he added.

But with the growing student movement against cutbacks, the desire of the faculty to protect job security, and the government's determination to cut spending on education, one can't help but feel that Ham will get caught in the squeeze. He will probably need something more than a vision and gracious gestures to pull him through the next years.

and Mail was quick to comment on the new U of T president.

An editorial appeared immediately after his appointment, centering on his speech.

Anthony Burgess interview

Can Lit's pros and cons

"If only one could say what one is writing about, things would be a lot easier."

Anthony Burgess, distinguished writer, composer, and linguist, appeared February 3 on CBC's 90 Minutes Live, ostensibly to do just that. While in Toronto, he was able to give some time to the Varsity.

At 61, John Anthony Burgess Wilson looks in good shape and rather better than his photographs. The well-traveled author of (among other books) the Enderby novels, the Malayan Trilogy, Re Joyce (James, that is) and Shakespeare, lives now with his second wife and thirteen-year-old son in Monaco.

Burgess is too often identified solely as author of A Clockwork Orange. "A terrible film," is his comment of Stanley Kubrick's cinematic version.

When the film first came out Burgess was criticised for its violence, and later for its effect as a cult film; and on 90 Minutes Live, host Peter Gzowski, in his would-be-engaging way, introduced the writer as "the godfather of punk rock". Does Burgess disown the film?

"Oh, yes, to a great extent. It's a different medium. I get angry when people talk about 'my' film — it's not my film at all! Unfortunately, it became my fault, especially in England. I'd published the book there in 1962, and they had to wait ten years before they discovered it was a bad book."

The frustration of his situation is depicted in The Clockwork Testament or Enderby's End, published in 1974. The main character in the novel is harassed publicly, on the telephone and in a hilarious scene on a rapid T.V. talkshow, for having provided the kernel of inspiration, in an obscure poem, for a cheap, violent, and very popular 'flick' based on Hopkins' "Wreck of the Deutschland".

"Yes, that was me. If anybody was raped or killed, it was always my fault: 'we saw the movie, the movie influenced us' . . ."

He has worked a lot in television, and has been writing a television series about Aristotle Onassis — "which is perhaps not a good idea, I don't know." Does he think the all-pervasive 'tube' has infected our lives? "You have to accept it. I'm a terrible telly-viewer myself."

Anthony Burgess

He had apparently been looking at a little television during his stay; "It doesn't seem to be doing very well here. In America, I think, it has to get better, because it can't get any worse. . . I don't think it's going to kill books. A book is something you can put in your pocket. It doesn't require a current, or anything else outside itself. It's got to last."

Burgess once said that the novel is the only remaining valuable literary form; he modifies that somewhat: "I think we can attempt mixed forms — but of course, people won't buy it. If you're writing for a living, as I have, you have to make some compromises, unfortunately. Shakespeare did that, so I don't see why we shouldn't."

"Certain writers tie up with the kind of sensibility you have yourself. I started my career as a musician; Shakespeare was a musician, and Joyce knew music. When I read authors who don't understand music, I'm very dubious about them, because they can't know the frontier between the two arts. Of course, music can do the job far better."

His writing is very much like music; he says his books are meant to follow musical structures.

"That's something you can learn from. I think it's possible to write a novel in Sonata form, where all the motivations are formal. That's probably the next stage we have to attempt in the novel — to fit characters totally to a pattern. But somehow characters won't yield, they always want to go their own way . . ."

Does Burgess the novelist resemble any one of his characters in particular? Where is the author in his novels? "I don't think any author knows who he is. The longer I spend in this business, the less I feel I have any personality of my own. I'm just a thing that writes books. There's a tendency to make yourself that way; the novel of ideas kills itself, because ideas don't last, and they get in the way of real people."

SAC'S TOO NAMBY-PAMBY

One of the ways to get people riled up is to claim that you know how to do something better than they do. Some people will hate you and some people will love you . . . sometimes you'll be right and sometimes you'll be wrong.

The Students' Administrative Council is the place to bring your ideas: namby-pamby ideas, violent-vitriolic ideas, peaceful-co-operative ideas — any sort of idea at all.

cont'd from 10

Burgess is sometimes fondly imagined as an extension of Enderby, one of his most well-known characters.

"That's not really fair, you mean somebody sitting in the lavatory all the time, writing? That's not true at all. There's an example of how an idea will come to you. I was living in Borneo at the time, the oddest place to conceive of such a character. I opened the bathroom door one day — what with the tropical heat and sun, I must have been suffering from malaria — and I saw somebody sitting on the toilet, writing.

"He disappeared right away, and the entire novel came out of that. I saw the character as somebody quite outside myself. There is a way in which a character will stay in your mind. I had to kill him off eventually. It isn't easy. You may say, 'he died'; that's only a matter of words."

What are his thoughts on Can Lit? "I've read as widely as I can in Canadian literature . . . I'm disappointed that Canada hasn't beaten the United States at the literary game. There are good Canadian writers, but the Americans have stolen the pitch, and I don't know why that should be. Even Bellow, who is not a terribly good writer, is really Canadian . . . you need somebody, at least, who can command that kind of respect."

He feels the next great stylistic breakthrough in literature, or music, might come in Canada, "and just incidentally be about Canada. This is the only way that a country like Canada can gain any self-confidence. It always comes from art, not from the extent of the boundaries or from natural resources, but from some kind of artistic achievement — even though the average person doesn't give a damn about it."

Burgess sincerely claims he senses Canada's importance as a country and a culture. He believes Canada is going to be the centre of the film industry. "The best technicians are here . . . the big technical experiments are going on here, not in major films." An arguable point, perhaps, among film students. "I believe in Canada. It's a nicer country than the United States. You have all the advantages without the nastiness . . ."

Burgess has lived almost everywhere but Great Britain for thirty-odd years. Self-imposed exile? Tax evasion? What is happening in England now?

"Oh, it's finished. Don't get me wrong, the British 'over there' are talented, clever, decent people, but there's a sense of 'it's all over, we've had our day, let's just have a good time while we can.'"

The books they have produced, he claims, are "very parochial, about the middle-class British experience: adultery in Hampstead or something like that." One exception is John Fowles, Burgess says. Naturally he cited the economic situation as a cause-symptom of Britain's 'malaise'. Does he think the labour government is beneficial?

"I don't think it's anything. Governments have nothing to do with real life. This is the great fallacy, you know, that literature should be political, should mirror political conflicts. You live your own life elsewhere . . . in your mind . . ."

Burgess commented on the use of sexuality in his books. Many of his characters wrestle with the problem of homosexuality or asexuality. "It's been held against me by various British critics that I am a homosexual, an epicene. I'm not a homosexual at all, I never have been. But I'm very interested in the symbolic possibilities."

A negative or positive symbol, Mr. Burgess? He doesn't know: perhaps we'll find out when he finishes a book he's working on now, a novel of Pope John XXIII as told by a homosexual.

"The homosexual situation is interesting from a writers angle. Incest, any kind of sexual abnormality or aberration is interesting. It suggests new ways of looking at ordinary people."

The author has recently completed a study of George Orwell's 1984, which will be published in one volume with a companion novel about the future, 'd'après Burgess' (possibly with echoes of The Wanting Seed and

A Clockwork Orange, entitled 1985.

He also plans at some point to write a history of the theatre, as well as a book about the English language — "a big, popular, silly, bouncing book, something like Your English, which would have a kind of popular appeal."

Some rather disheartening comments for the eager writer: "I fear that the publishing business is forcing novelists to cling to existing formats. 'We have to register a profit', they say. This is what you will find, when you take up writing as a career, that you're up against people who should not exist."

"Editors are damnable people, and publishers generally are pretty damnable people too. They have to justify their existence by making changes. You can't allow that."

Why did he turn from music to the craft of writing in the mid-fifties? "It was a question of the immense difficulty of getting works performed — then people clap, somebody writes about it, and where do you go from there? It's a sense of being a slave to something very evanescent."

"The music is always there. It's certainly an important art, and I want to go on practising it. But I have to make my living by writing fiction."

The interviewer is interviewed but it's not the first time for Brian Linehan. The host of CITY-TV's daily half hour interview show City Lights has himself become a celebrity since the show started in 1973. It is by no means a case of celebrity by association. The secret of Linehan's success lies in his painstaking research and his ability to draw out his guests with intelligent questions and a warm, engaging personality.

Linehan's rise to prominence as one of Canada's most respected television journalists has become a legend. One day he was asked to replace a freelance interviewer who didn't show up for an interview with Canadian film director Eric Till. Linehan did it. The result? "I was asked again and again and all of a sudden I was doing a television show."

The beginning wasn't all that easy for Linehan. He had never been on television before the Till interview. His official job at CITY-TV was producer of programming whose responsibility was to buy all movies (including the Baby Blue films) and any television series the station aired. Also, Linehan had to learn how to deal with people ridiculing his appearance (he's broken his nose three times) as well as with how he sounded.

Another criticism about Linehan was his supposed tendency to "gush over" his guests in those early interviews.

"Yes, I was star struck. Who in this world wouldn't be, going from what I had been doing and within a matter of months sitting in a chair opposite Paul Newman, Michael Caine and Jack Lemmon.

Linehan says he's no longer star struck. "Now it's based on degrees of respect and of course there are all those times when you haven't any at all but you have to do the show. I don't find it particularly rewarding to have met people like Ginger Rogers or Mickey Rooney. We all know that only bastards and cream rise so you have to work hard and show business is no joke, no joke at all."

City Lights is now one of the most successful Canadian programs in syndication, with viewers in Vancouver, Montreal, Winnipeg and Calgary. According to a TV Guide interview, Linehan is affectionately regarded by the sales department of CITY-TV as "an effete elitist whose main appeal is to a snobbish few." What he does, he does for himself first he says, then "secondly for the person I am with and then I hope somebody appreciates it but I have never pandered to an audience or a person, not in my professional or my personal relationships."

It does distress him though that approximately an extra half million Canadians will watch his interviews with Burt Reynolds or Clint Eastwood, then disappear when he's on with Margaret Atwood. "I now accept the reality that I'm not here to educate. As people with more experience and knowledge have taught me, you can't inform unless you entertain."

Often called the Canadian Dick Cavett, Linehan says he wouldn't fashion himself after anybody. However, if there has to be a comparative study he'd rather hear himself being compared to Cavett than to Merv Griffin, Mike Douglas or anybody else. "I'm rather flattered because he was indeed my favorite interviewer and long before I ever imagined doing anything like this he was somebody I respected."

The list of interviews Linehan has done this season alone reads like Who's Who of film. Liza Minnelli, Kris Kristofferson, John Travolta, Henry Winkler, Peter O'Toole, among other. By this spring he will have done over 1,000 shows. He calls it an emotionally exhausting job, so much so that he doesn't want to stay in the business. Although Linehan is considering the idea of 90-minute shows he doesn't want to talk about what he'll be doing a few months or years from now because he's "Irish enough to think it's a curse."

The one interview Linehan would like to do before he ends his career as an interviewer is with Greta Garbo. Why? "Because she won't give anybody one. I think that's a terrific reason. That would be an achievement. I'd ask her why and see if she'd speak. Just why, that would be a good opening."

Although research and preparation are Linehan's forte, they have caused him trouble with some guests defying him to surprise them with a tidbit of obscure information he knows about them. "They wait for the surprise," he says almost unbelievably. "Well, very often there isn't one. I'm not a clown. This isn't a game of waiting for the person to say golly gee how did you ever know that?"

"I'll tell you the truth about interviewing people. An interview is as good as the person you are with is generous. You can do all the preparation in the world and the person can say aha, no and I've had it; I mean I've been through it."

It's not difficult to find the generosity in Brian Linehan, a sincere generosity combined with intelligence and integrity which makes City Lights a shining star.

How many generations can fit into a Betsy?

Betsy lacks socially redeeming smut

Criticism seems irrelevant to a film like The Betsy. This film isn't a mere turkey, it's a dodo.

But why should a critic be discouraged in the pursuit of his profession. One might take this movie seriously, after all, according to Time Magazine, it has taken in $26-million already.

It also has Laurence Olivier's name up there in the credits. He is the aging but virile patriarch of a Detroit automobile company, Bethlehem Motors. Where his accent comes from God only knows.

In spite of (or perhaps because of) Olivier's proclivity for dashing into bed with everyone from the chambermaid to his daughter-in-law, his son, though married and with a son of his own, is a homosexual. The grandson has a daughter played by Kathleen Beller. This means in case you have lost count, that there are four grown up generations of the Hardiman family roistering around at once. This is quite enough to keep your mind off the serious aspect of this film. What is really going on — though it may escape your notice — is an expose of intrigue and power struggles in the auto industry. This must be so because the press release tells us so.

Actually the film steers a very careful course between good and bad — it remains grindingly mediocre throughout. Good grief it's not even decently sleazy. There are only a couple of classic groaners in the dialogue. One such occurs when Loren Hardiman, the aforesaid aging but virile patriarch, or Number One as he is called by his family and business associates, is discovered making love to a chambermaid by his daughter-in-law on her wedding day. Years later, she informs him of this and says: "Ever since I saw you and her together I've wanted to have it that way just once." Number One duly obliges and once is not enough.

Unfortunately for all you in middle management out there, this film points out that those who reach the top in business also have the best sex lives.

Tommy Lee Jones plays Angelo Perrino, who has been hired by Olivier to help him build the Betsy — the name of a new car that will get 60 miles to the gallon. Incidentally Betsy is also the name of the great-granddaughter.

Racing car driver, budding capitalist, designer of the revolutionary new car and stud extraordinaire, Angelo Perrino is the hero. In order to show what an active sex life he has (with the accent on active) he and his partners have developed a new sex position: the roll.

I have a private theory that this is the sort of film that suburban housewives go to when what they really want to see is pornography. The film doesn't even succeed on that level. The sex scenes are so dull and clean you get the feeling that they've been sent to the dry cleaners for martinizing. Kathleen Beller does have enough cleavage to make Lana Turner green with envy. I thought she looked entirely gross once she had removed her clothes though. My companion (male) disagreed.

The only memorable acting in the pictures comes from Edward Herriman as a Yes-man who foams at the mouth when his ulcers acts up. He was tall and slimy but at least he looked as though he belonged in the movie. Laurence Olivier was only slightly less effective and his acting talents were much in evidence. It takes great talent to achieve such a tour de force in a shamelessly bad film.

BC money withdrawn from bank

VICTORIA (CPS-CUP) — The student council here voted earlier this month to withdraw its long-term investments from banks dealing with the Government of South Africa, but fell short of a complete boycott of the campus branch of the Bank of Montreal.

Students decided by a one-vote margin to leave short-term deposits in the branch, because no feasible alternative could be proposed, and because any transfer would "inconvenience" those who work for the society.

In the United States, the anti-apartheid campaign has met with confrontation from university administrators. Three students were arrested and demonstrators were maced when University of Wisconsin protesters tried to crash a board of regents meeting which was deciding that university's investment policies. The regents voted 14-2 in favor of divestiture, and angry maced students flooded the first six floors of the building where the regents were meeting.

University of Chicago trustees ignored a 1,500-signature petition demanding divestiture, calling student concern "much ado about nothing" and claiming the university "has a duty to invest in South Africa if it means a higher rate of return." Twenty-three of the university's 55 trustees are directors of corporations with operations in South Africa — 10 trustees direct banks that make loans to the Vorster regime.

Women find engineer paper sexist

SASKATOON (CUP) — The University of Saskatchewan's women's directorate is mounting a concerted campaign against a sexist paper published by the campus engineering students society.

The paper, the Red Eye, according to editor Glenn Parker contained "the best from 13 engineering papers across Canada."

It included a graphic depicting the "perfect woman" as legs, breasts and pubic hair, a parody of the Peanuts comic strip showing Linus raping Lucy, and columns calling for such things as "an open season on faggots."

The women's directorate has written to the paper's advertisers explaining the nature of the paper, held open meetings to discuss the paper and urged that colleges dominated by women break off all co-operation with the engineering society.

Although more than 100 people have filed individual complaints against the paper, the student union quashed a directorate attempt to file a group complaint against the paper with the provincial human rights commission.

The engineering society has apologized for the content of the paper, admitting that "maybe we went a little too far."

Parker has said he is surprised by the "violence" of the reaction against the paper, and attempted to justify its degradation of women by saying "we degraded a lot of other people as well."

Women's director Vicki Barclay says the attitudes of the engineering society have not changed at all.

Records Fall At National Final

By HUGH STUART

In the Canadian Indoor Track and Field championships held in Montreal last weekend, American runner Jan Merrill set a new world indoor record for 3,000 metres attributing her success to the superb facilities of Claude Robillard Arena. These facilities also worked to the advantage of U of T athletes as Dave Watt, Steven Cheung, and Jill Ross each set personal records.

The triple jump featured a one-two finish by University of Toronto Track Club members. Watt, whose intercollegiate eligibility had run out, won the event with a jump of 15.55 metres.

Steve Cheung proved that he is an athlete to reckon with in the future as he finished second, also in a personal best distance. Success is nothing new to either of the pair. Watt has won numerous national titles, while Cheung won both the long and triple jump events of the Ontario college championships held two weeks ago.

Two weeks ago, Bob MacCormack edged U of T's Paul Craig to win the 1,500 metre and set a new Canadian indoor record. One of the feature races of last weekend's event was supposed to be the 1,500. But the matchup of Craig and MacCormack never materialised as Craig was simply too strong and experienced for MacCormack. Craig won the race while MacCormack finished a distant fourth and was then disqualified.

Great things were expected from the U of T high jumpers, but the poor organization of the event hurt them badly. There were over twenty jumpers which meant that competitors were waiting up to an hour and a half between jumps. Nevertheless, Roland DeMarchi turned in an outstanding performance. Although bothered by injuries he finished third, in one of the best jumps of his career. Steve Dovaston did not have one of his better days, but he still managed to clear a respectable 2.05 metres. Carl Georgevski, and OUAA champ Rob Pitter both cleared 2.00 metres.

Jill Ross served notice that she is ready to take over the pentathlon crown from Diane Jones-Konihowski. Ross amassed 4,065 points and U of T and national jump coach Zoltan Tenke says that only Ross' caution prevented her from scoring more points. He explains that "In the broad jump, Jill would jump too early for fear of foot faulting. I suppose that was a wise strategy but jumping a bit later would have given her many more points."

U of T's other female competitor was sprinter and sprint hurdler Jean Sparling. Sparling, who won the 50 metre hurdles and the 50 metre dash two weeks ago at the OWIAA's, finished well in Montreal. Basically a hurdler, she still managed to make the semi-finals of the 50 metre dash. In the 50 metre hurdles she finished third.

There were international team positions at stake in the meet. Dave Watt will represent Canada in the triple jump against Italy in the dual meet to be held at Montreal on the seventeenth. Steve Cheung may also be in the meet. His chance depends upon whether Mike Nipinuk, who set the Canadian indoor record in an American meet, can be released to compete by his university in Philadelphia.

Jill Ross also qualified for international competition. Her second place finish in the pentathlon means that she will be leaving for Colorado Springs this Thursday to train for the Canadian-American pentathlon competition.

Tenke, who arrived in Canada four years ago was impressed both by the quality and the spirit of the competitors. He explains that "It wasn't until the OUAA'S that I had seen the kind of spirit necessary for Canada to develop into a strong track and field country. But it was there two weeks ago, and it was there again last weekend. Canada could have a fine track and field future."

Based on last weekend's performances, if Canada does become a track and field power, it may be University of Toronto athletes that lead the way.

Jill Ross performed as she has been doing all year, breaking her personal record.

Budget Cuts Don't K.O. Boxers

By ALEX CHEN

There was a time when the jocular grapevine was rattling with rumours that the U of T boxing club was about to float belly up.

Last fall when the athletic department withdrew its financial support, there seemed to be little chance that the boxing club would continue on a regular basis. However, six months after an aggressive membership drive and a massive campaign for funds was begun, the boxing club is about to re-establish its place in the U of T sporting scene.

A week ago last Friday, there were finally sufficient funds to send a U of T Boxing team to Brockport State University, New York. Before a large Brockport crowd, the Varsity team fought a top calibre American team. The final score of two wins, two ties and two losses was more than encouraging.

After the uncertain start to this season, it took months of hard work and preparation from both the boxers and coaches to reach this point. The infusion of many new members has made this year's squad as strong as any that have gone before it.

On Friday, a rematch between the Boxing Blues and Brockport will take place in the upper gymnasium of Hart House at 8:00 p.m. This will be the only intercollegiate boxing card to be held in Canada this season.

Heading the list of participants for the U of T team, is defending United States Intercollegiate Champion, Jason Lo. Lo was the surprise winner of the flyweight title last year as he went on from decisive wins against Westchester College to take the national crown. Lo combined lightning combinations and agility to take top honours.

Also on the card is fourth year Arts student Ralph Jensen. Jensen, who has been boxing at U of T for three years will face one of the Brockport coaches in what promises to be one of the best fights of the night.

Also fighting for U of T are Richard Wright of SGS, fourth year Phys Ed student Steve Way, veteran Elie Kivity, powerful lefty Victor Paddy and rookies Mark Shea and Joe Pileggi.

Admission is only one dollar.

The Varsity — Tim Fletcher

Ralph Jensen is preparing to meet Brockport.

Close Finish In Fencing Finals

Early Saturday morning, groggy fencers assembled at the Benson Building to decide the club champions in foil and sabre. For team members, including retiring veterans Brad Patterson, Jim Cheng and Alan Steljes, it was a last chance to compete this season and to try their hand at different weapons. For several future team prospects, such as Randle Wilson and Paul Chalak, it was an excellent opportunity to gain some valuable experience.

A large field of 16 foilists was trimmed to a very strong final of six. Competition was extremely close as all fencers were familiar with each others' strengths and weaknesses. Styles varied from the dazzling footwork of Len ("Mississauga Rattler") Subotich to the Nijinsky-like leaps of "Stomping Tom" Chalak but the top two places remained undecided until Jean-Marc Cavaillon of Paris, France met team captain Rick Arthur (East York) in a dramatic fence-off. The European's advanced, free-wheeling style, frustrated Arthur's usually tight defence as Cavaillon captured top honours. Admitted Arthur, "He had the best of me today." Steljes was third.

The sabre competition was even tighter, requiring a three way fence-off. Imre Boma-Fischer (second in the OUAA final) and Jim Cheng (sixth) were joined by southpaw Doug Crawford (who missed this season due to heavy studies in Medicine). The more experienced Fischer narrowly defeated the other two for the title.

Phys Ed Blows Cool

Vic Takes Playoff Game

By HUGH STUART

Phys Ed went Berserk, the ref escaped without injury and Vic I skated away with a 1-0 victory in a Division One A interfaculty hockey playoff at Varsity Arena yesterday.

Vic's goal was scored with less than two minutes left in the game while two Phys Ed players were in the penalty box. The trouble started with about three minutes left in the game when the ref called a questionable penalty against Phys Ed.

The Phys Ed team erupted, threatening the ref and drawing additional penalties leaving them two men short. In the ensuing power play, G. Fodden put Vic into the lead.

Pys Ed erupted again with increased ferocity. The ref was shoved and verbally abused. The result was two ten minute misconducts, one game misconduct and one match penalty.

The childish display by Phys Ed spoiled what had been, up to that point, a pretty good hockey game. Both Vic's Andy Tyoneszeniez and Phys Ed's Brian Yeo turned in sparkling performances in the nets.

It was a rough game with a few minor skirmishes but for the most part, cleanly played.

The referee's only comment after the game was that it was a good game. "If Phys Ed hadn't lost their cool they might have at least tied."

Vic now advances to the next round while Phys Ed has the summer to cool off.

When Phys Ed wasn't complaining they played some pretty good hockey.

New aid plan leak confirmed

By HEATHER HILL

After a protracted waiting period, fraught with students' criticisms and plagued by embarrassing news leaks, the new Ontario Student Assistance Program (OSAP) was released yesterday in its entirety.

The booklet confirms students' suspicions of inequities in the plan and the details in previous press releases from the Ministry of Colleges and Universities. The program, which comprises four separate plans, reveals some new points.

A single independent student will receive a maximum award of $1,000 for each grant eligibility period. The plan also anticipates that students eligible for grants will live $1,900 below the poverty level as determined by Statistics Canada.

The grant eligibility periods are limited at eight, as the ministry earlier stated. The periods, lasting from 10 to 19 weeks each, are exhausted if the student drops out. The periods are also used up even if the student doesn't apply for OSAP assistance.

The plan provides for students who have used up their eligibility periods and still wish to continue their education — students in professional faculties — with a Loan Remission scheme.

The scheme, "designed to ease the transition for these students to the new OSAP," is available to students with Canada or Ontario Student Loans for the period from 1978-1980. The ministry, out of a fund of $15-million, will pay a portion of the loan's principal directly to the student's lending bank.

According to the scheme, the portion remitted will be a percentage of the loan over and above the first interest-free $1,000. The amount will also depend on the number of students who apply for Loan Remission.

Students will receive assistance according to their "Calculated Financial Need", determined in turn by which of two categories they belong to. Every student is in Group A unless he or she marries prior to the inception of the eligibility period; has worked full-time for two years or more; has completed four or more years of post-secondary studies; or has worked for one year and studied at the post-secondary level for three.

A Group A student's loan requires financial contribution from both student and parents. The parents' contribution is based on their net income after allowable deductions. Parents making between $9,001 and $9,100 with one child would contribute $25.50 according to the "Parental Contribution Formula" of the Student Loans Plan.

Single Group B students alone make a contribution under both the grant plan and the loans plan.

Student sit-in at Carleton U third occupation this week

By HEATHER HILL

Yet another Ontario university has been occupied by students protesting provincial cutbacks on education and demanding a March 16 moratorium on classes.

Seventeen Carleton University students took over the offices of acting president John Porter yesterday at 8:45 a.m. "in order to focus attention on an educational system being jeopardized by provincial cutbacks."

The students, members of the Carleton Committee against Cutbacks, have presented four demands to the university administration:

- that acting president Porter suspend classes March 16 (the day of the anti-cutbacks rally at Queen's Park).

- That the Carleton Senate take a public stand supporting the educational system and opposing cutbacks in social and educational services.

- that the budget-making process at Carleton be opened to the Carleton University community. (At present, the Board of Governors' financial committee decides the budget in camera.)

- that the Carleton administration make renewed efforts to secure an extension on library space and hours. (The library falls far below the Council on Ontario Universities' space entitlements.)

Dan Westhill, spokesperson for the Carleton Committee against Cutbacks, said yesterday in a telephone interview that the group's members intend to stay in Porter's office "until we are satisfied that our demands have been met."

Westhill said that support on campus for the sit-in has been "overwhelming."

"There are a few people who don't want to sign our petition, for purely political reasons. But I think the administration will do what it can. Our demands are directed in the long run at the government."

Westhill was referring to a petition of endorsement for the committee circulating on campus. Barbara Bailey, director of the Education and Research office for the Carleton University Students' Association (CUSA), said that by 10:30 p.m.

Wednesday the petition had over 2,000 signatures. She said that "approximately 1,000 more" have subsequently been added.

Bailey said that an emergency meeting of the Senate is being held at noon today to debate the committee's demands. She said that on March 6 the Senate defeated by 11-10 an earlier proposal to close the university March 16 "with only about a third of the Senate there."

The Carleton Committee against Cutbacks is a body acting independently of CUSA. However, Westhill said that CUSA has endorsed the committee and is sending three buses to the Queen's Park rally.

Staff meet Sunday

There will be a staff meeting on Sunday at 1:00 pm to discuss the Varsity's position on the March 16 demonstration at Queen's Park and the possibility of endorsing candidates in the SAC elections.

Sexism down through the ages

By URIEL WITTENBERG

A Historical perspective of oppression and discrimination against women was outlined to a mostly female audience of about 100 in a talk Wednesday entitled "Herstory — The Women's Movement: Yesterday and Today."

Professor Mary O'Brian of the Sociology department and the OISE Women's Resource Centre spoke in one of this week's events marking International Women's Day (Mar. 11).

England in Mary Tudor's (Bloody Mary) time is often portrayed by male history writers as a country with fires and the smell of burning flesh everywhere, O'Brian said, but only a couple of hundred people were actually burnt at the stake under Mary's reign.

O'Brian informed the audience that as a child playing games, she had always preferred the role of Bloody Mary. "My name was Mary and I sure as hell didn't want to be the Virgin Mary."

O'Brian stated that "Male supremacy is an ideology as well as a reality," and that this ideology has its origins in the "marvellous works of philosophy" we have inherited. She argued that it's worthwhile for women to consider those works today.

She gave as an example Karl Marx's writings. Marx, she said, spoke much of "productive labor," but not at all of "reproductive labor."

Socrates' wife is always portrayed as a nag, said O'Brian, but she had kids to feed, even if her "fat old husband preferred to talk under the juniper tree about truth, beauty and goodness." Her favorite cat, O'Brian told the audience, is named after Socrates' wife.

O'Brian said that the German philosopher Georg Hegel was "mad at the Romans" for allowing women to own real estate, and he attributed the fall of the Roman Empire to this failing. O'Brian said that she is tempted to explain the low birth rate in the Roman Empire just before its fall to women's recognition of the empire's foolishness, but not enough evidence exists to defend this.

Paper airplane winner flies fifty feet, short of Barbados

By RANDY WINTER

The first annual U of T Paper Airplane Contest was a great success, judging by the high quality of the entries and the enthusiasm of the large crowd of spectators.

The event, sponsored by the Mathematics Course Union, was held in the lobby of Sid Smith yesterday at noon. Origami (Japanese paper folding) books were awarded to the winners in each of five divisions.

The winner for overall distance with a flight of 50 feet was Hartley Garshowitz (UC III). Momentarily confused by the thrill of victory, Garshowitz asked, "Where's my trip to Barbados?" He later claimed that his entry would be on display in the Aeronautical Museum next week.

Accuracy winner Derek Jones of New College was the only contestant to land his entry in the one-foot-square bulls-eye. He said it was "all in the wrist." Acrobatics champ Andy Woerle (Civ Eng I) when asked for a comment, replied, "Eng Sci sux."

The entry with the most aesthetic appeal, according to the judges, belonged to Phil Lightstone (Vic. I). His craft resembled a rolled triangle and actually flew once or twice. Tom Wu (UC I) was the only person to fly a plane from balcony to balcony. His first attempt hit the contest banner on the opposite railing, and when that was removed he managed to take the division.

The only casualty of the contest was the SAC Info Desk which was ransacked for building materials.

Moratorium requested

Will U of T join the growing ranks of Ontario universities that shut down the day of anti-cutbacks rally at Queen's Park?

A statement on the official policy for March 16 will be issued today, according to Provost Donald Chant.

Chant, who said yesterday that he has met "at least five times this week on the issue" with U of T president John Evans, declined to say whether a decision had been reached.

"Until the announcement goes out, I don't think I can even say whether the decision has been finalized," said Chant.

Last Friday student council president John Tuzyk delivered a letter on behalf of the U of T Cutbacks Coalition asking for a moratorium on classes for a few hours in the afternoon of March 16.

Evans had left for Ottawa yesterday afternoon and was unavailable for comment.

Buddies, silliness -- Erindale issues

By PETER HOENADEL

Four people have declared their candidacy for the position of president in the Erindale College Student's Union (ECSU) elections to be held March 23 and 24.

Current ECSU president Rob Mowat has entered his name for reelection as the head of a "Silly Party" slate. Also running on the Silly Party ticket will be Doug Alcock (Administrative) and Kevin Muhall (Business). According to Alcock, the Silly Party did not want to reveal their platform to The Varsity at this early stage in the campaign.

Silly Party presidential hopeful Rob Mowat is also a vice-presidential candidate on a slate running in the student council (SAC) elections at the St. George campus.

CFRE Radio Erindale manager Greg Tyndall is also in the race for ECSU president. Along with CFRE News Director Jack Shand (Business) and Jules Bloch (Administrative) as vice-presidents, Tyndall hopes to impress Erindale voters with the administrative experience of his slate. Bloch is also acclaimed for a Constituency I seat on Governing Council.

Tyndall says he has monitored the activities of the present ECSU board very closely over the past year. He is very critical of the "buddy system" that has affected the present board's objectivity, especially manifested in the recent firing of Blind Duck Pub manager Paul Linklater.

Tyndall is anxious that ECSU "become incorporated as soon as possible" in order to protect students from the "de facto" governing process of the present board. Tyndall's main priorities as president will be to improve the financial efficiency of ECSU and maintain good relations with SAC and the Erindale administration.

Ray Easterbrook is running for ECSU president, with Bill Train (Administrative) and Steve Guiton (Business) as his vice-presidents.

"We have become increasingly disturbed with the previous management's mismanagement," Easterbrook said. He is concerned with finding competent people to direct the various ECSU organizations and giving these people greater autonomy.

Easterbrook also pledged to maintain good relations with SAC and to involve the Erindale residences in campus life. With regard to the public image of ECSU, Easterbrook said, "We will try and stop the growing disorientation between ECSU and students by improving communications with students."

Wellington Womble has entered the race with the campaign slogan: "Let's work together to clean up student government."

One of Womble's highest priorities as president will be to protect the Erindale environment. In line with his conservation policy, Womble plans to use the back of old posters to publicize his campaign, in order to reduce needless waste.

Womble says he is anxious to bring ECSU's responsibility to the foreground by offering as many services as possible for students. Speaking for Womble, campaign manager Rick Harrison said, "we want to give everybody a fair shake at budget time."

Mark Kushnirenko, a third-year Commerce student at Erindale College, plans to run as an independent candidate for the position of financial vice-president. Kushnirenko stated that by running as an independent he hopes to avoid coercion from the other members of a slate. He wants to rise above the "petty politics of ECSU" and make decisions base on "plain old common sense."

The present ECSU board has changed the structure of their governing body so that next year's student government will comprise 20 elected representatives sitting on four commissions — Social, Cultural, Academic and Liaison. At the close of nominations, only eight nominations had been received for these positions.

Darlene van Noode has been accepted by acclamation to the Social Committee. John Belanti has been acclaimed to the Cultural commission.

ECSU president Rob Mowat said that by-elections will be held to fill the vacant positions. Erindale students can meet the ECSU candidates at a public forum scheduled for March 27 at noon in the Meeting Place at Erindale College.

The constitution of the University of Toronto Faculty Association requires candidates for President to be nominated by members of the UTFA Council. Members of the Association, however, are invited to suggest names to council members.

Nomination forms are available in the UTFA office in the TIP TOP TAILOR BUILDING, 455 Spadina Avenue. The nomination form requires the signature of 2 members of the UTFA Council and must be returned to the office by March 10. The election will be conducted by a mailed ballot of the embership in the following two weeks.

Acclaimed candidate disappointed

By ANDREW MAHON

Jules Bloch was acclaimed early this week as a full time undergraduate member of Governing Council. However, Bloch meets this news with mixed reactions.

"At the moment I feel I could be a neo-fascist or anything else and still have pulled the wool over the students' eyes," said Bloch. "I really don't think it's fair to the student body."

Bloch originally decided to run for Governing Council because he felt that "someone from a suburban college should be on the council."

Bloch is an Erindale student, who has also been nominated for vice-president of the Erindale College Student Union (ECSU). A political science student, Bloch has been involved in collegial politics in Quebec for the past two years. During that time he served as External Liaison Officer for the Vanier College Student Union and also as chairman and spokesman for the Caucus of Anglophone Post-Secondary Students.

Bloch is also a DJ at CFRE (Erindale's radio station).

As a newly acclaimed member of Governing Council, Bloch has more than a few criticisms of the body. "Obviously as a student I don't feel we have a proper voice on the council," explains Bloch. There are six students on the council.

"I don't agree with the way people are appointed to the council by the Ontario Government," he continued. "These people don't have a real interest in the college — they are really out of touch with college life."

The Macdonald report and the New New Program are two issues which Bloch thinks will be extremely important as Governing Council moves into a new year.

The Macdonald report particularly disturbs Bloch since it means that "students will have less of a voice" in the decision-making process at U of T.

Running for both ECSU vice-president and Governing Council will present Bloch with what he feels is a unique opportunity at having "a chance to make college decisions and then try and see their implementation at the University level."

Money main issue, says another

By PAUL F. ROONEY

Donald Arthur Guloien, one of two student representatives acclaimed to the Governing Council last Friday, is a second-year Commerce and Finance student at University College. His administrative experience includes current membership on the General Committee of the Faculty of Arts and Sciences, the Social Sciences Curriculum Committee, the Commerce Student-Faculty Curriculum Committee, the Hart House Board of Stewards, the Hart House Finance Committee and the Hart House Capital Expenditures Sub-Committee.

Guloien is also a member of the Executive of the Commerce Students' Association and the International Association of Students of Commerce and Economics.

Guloien feels the focus of Governing Council next year should be on the university's financial problems. The provincial government does not increase its subsidy for each student to match the increase in inflation, he said, which means a reduction in the amount of money available to run the university. Guloien said that consequently "the major issue is the proper allocation of the resources we do have."

Eighty per cent of U of T's budget is spent on faculty salaries, Guloien said. Although he admitted it's only fair that faculty get a salary increase to combat inflation, he added that they must realize enrolment is dropping and there are lots of potential professors around with less expectation of an increase.

Guloien wants more emphasis on the evaluation of a professor's teaching ability when considering promotion and tenure. At the moment, he said, the faculty uses student union evaluations chiefly to suit their own purposes. "They use them when they want to get rid of a professor," said Guloien. He wants evaluation to be handled by the administration.

Referring to the Campus as Campus Centre plan, Guloien said he is "in favor of it as a philosophy," but added that the present student council plans for the Sidney Smith area are untenable from an engineering standpoint. In his opinion "we should improve the meeting centres at each college to strengthen the sense of college community spirit," and make them more visible so all students will know where they are and can use them. He was in favor through of grassing over the Sussex-Huron area saying "those roads aren't needed."

Guloien agrees with the official university policy towards speakers from racist regimes. That is, to allow them free access to speak here, but in no way to support them financially for doing so.

OFS gets last hold-out

By JIM TRAWN

Students at the University of Ottawa have voted to join both the Ottawa Federation of Students (OFS) and the National Union of Students (NUS) in a referendum vote held Wednesday.

Ottawa was the only Ontario university which did not belong to OFS.

The OFS margin of victory was 616 to 409, while the NUS forces racked up a 581 to 498 win. The referendum was held on the same ballot with the Student Federation presidential elections.

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university.

The Varsity is managed by the Varsity Committee which is responsible for the management, financial policies, and editorial integrity of The Varsity.

An express function of the committee is to receive and consider complaints about the paper. Formal signed complaints — as opposed to letters to the editor — should be addressed to: The Chairman, Varsity Committee, 91 St. George St., Toronto, Ontario.

COUGH, COUGH UP

Inane policies by the provincial government will probably mean that St. George campus students will be forced to cough up an additional $2 towards Athletic costs next year. The Athletic Department has been forced to seek this increase because budget cutbacks are threatening the present level of programming.

Among many discouraging notes in the recently released provincial budget is the increase of OHIP premiums by a whopping 37.5 per cent. Rising hospital and medical costs are the explanation given by Queen's Park for this jump.

Paradoxically the provincial government is on one hand, complaining about the rising costs of keeping Ontario residents healthy, while on the other, they have instituted a policy which will make it even harder for U of T students to stay fit.

Without the athletic fee increase programs will definitely be cut. There are five possible areas where elimination will occur.

- Elimination of the instruction program or a major portion of this program. At present about 5,000 students enjoy the programs run by the instruction department.
- Elimination of the fitness program which offers opportunities for otherwise inactive people to get in shape.
- Elimination of the sports therapy and surgery facilities which at present operate out of Hart House and provide emergency assistance for students injured in interfaculty or intercollegiate competition.
- Elimination of advertising and promotion programs which are essential to raise interest in U of T athletics and subsequently, revenue in the form of gate receipts.

• The further elimination of intercollegiate sports. To meet the budget restrictions this could be done in one of two ways. A major program such as football or hockey could be scrapped at a saving of close to $40,000. Or football and hockey could be retained but all other intercollegiate sports could be scrapped. While the intercollegiate program is open to relatively few university athletes, it serves thousands of students who either attend the games or benefit from their revenue producing capabilities.

Raising the athletic fee was a last resort by the department. In their initial budget released six weeks ago some program cuts were indicated but there was to be no fee increase. The department was determined to hold the line until the opening of the new athletic complex in 1979.

A revision of enrolment figures three weeks ago caused a re-assessment of this plan. It was learned that the university fell short of projected enrolment figures by 862 students. A further decline of 1,000 students was predicted for next year.

What this meant to the Athletic Department was that they would have to re-write their budget, eliminating at minimum $27,000 from a budget which was already reduced by $74,000 from last year.

This was impossible without major program cuts. The Tories have left the Athletic Department two choices. It can cut the programs currently offered students or go the route it has chosen and seek a $2 fee increase.

Just another example of how students are getting screwed by government cutbacks.

Elliot take no Seide

I am quite aware of Mr. Elliot Seide's active campaign to silence me and the other GSU rep from the Graduate Association of Students in Political Science (GASPS), from defending freedom of the press at GSU Council meetings. He doesn't want me to speak. No doubt he thinks the large apathy of the GSU Council will allow such a gross abuse of basic freedom as the secret firing of the Grad Post editor by the GSU executive to go unnoticed once I'm silenced.

I'm quite aware from my own difficulty in trying to assure GASPS representation on the GSU Council how difficult it is to get interest in that organization. I don't think, however, those in the GSU have in any way encouraged participation in their organization. To assure GASPS representation on the GSU Council, I do sit on it. Until I started defending freedom of the press, I was unnoticed.

Mr. Seide's active campaign to silence GSU reps is curious. He is supposedly the "impartial" chairperson of the GSU Council. After I was ruled out of order 20 or 30 times by his substitute at the last GSU Council meeting, after every motion concerning the editor of the Grad Post was ruled out of order, our other GASPS rep exclaimed, "That chair was not impartial!" Mr. Seide to me doesn't appear impartial either. His request to me for an executive meeting of GASPS was for the purpose of letting the GSU executive put forth their side. He objected when I suggested that Maria Horvath, Grad Post editor, would also have to be invited for it to be fair. Mr. Seide's actions in this don't appear impartial; yet Mr. Seide is the chairperson for the GSU Council.

I personally think it is highly unethical for the "impartial" chair of the GSU Council to so actively seek to silence GSU reps. My refusal to call a GASPS executive meeting, specially at Mr. Seide's request, was partly based on that view. Another GSU Council member has called Seide's behavior "scandalous" in this matter. It is scandalous. Particularly when combined with considerable public documentation on the GSU executive's attempt to "cover-up" their secret dismissal attacks on the editor of the Grad Post, Mr. Seide's behavior appears even more dubitable.

Mr. Seide has attacked me as undemocratic. Yet, anyone who knows me, and knows how GASPS has been operated this year (with the exception perhaps of Mr. Seide) knows that is not true. Two years ago GASPS was inactive. Last year, it held one dinner and two wine-and-cheese parties, two general meetings, one open committee meeting; it has petitioned and obtained equal student participation on the PhD program committee; it has sought strong student input on faculty search committees; it has sponsored a basketball team; presently it is in the middle of a series of graduate student paper-readings at faculty homes; it has stood up for open and free discussion of the GSU executive's secret attempt to fire the editor of the Grad Post, Maria Horvath.

Unlike the GSU, we have encouraged and been fortunate enough to get large student participation in our activities. I personally moved for changes in our Constitution allowing an Executive Board to be established, which expanded the number in our executive to at least ten more graduate students. Our executive board is far larger than the GSU's. It has worked well, because it has allowed a far wider number to be active in its decision-making. That's democratic. Our first dinner-general meeting had over 60 students present. Our second general meeting had over 40. The open meeting on student input into faculty replacement and leave-taking had at least 25 students. GSU Council would be hard pressed to match those numbers. Our parties have always run over 60 persons. I think we've proven participatory democracy works when one is committed to it.

I don't believe Mr. Seide or the GSU executive is committed to participatory democracy. At the first GASPS general meeting, as chair, Mr. Seide tried to rule out of order a motion from the floor relevant to the topic discussed. I asked him to allow it (and he graciously complied.) At our second general meeting, he asked that members of the faculty Graduate Committee, invited to explain PhD program changes, be asked to leave the meeting. Many students were upset when the requests were complied with. Mr. Seide, if he wants, can get nine other people and petition for a third general meeting, for the purpose of censuring me or whatever else he has in mind.

His past actions and mine show who is democratic and who is not. I will, however, flatly state that I will continue to follow my conscience in representing the graduate students in political science until such time as a general meeting does censure me. Mr. Seide has included many charges against me, almost as many as his friends have found against Maria Horvath, editor of the Grad Post. I won't answer them all, but I will say that our Executive never dictates to its GSU reps, nor does it ever attempt to bind the consciences of our members. We allow utmost freedom to people to do as they believe right.

Mr. Seide's position is consistent: "Censure those that speak in defence of freedom of the press". It's consistent but it's wrong. The GSU executive's position in secretly attempting to fire the editor of the Grad Post is consistent. It's consistent but it's wrong.

Masada's racism

By now almost everyone in Toronto is sure to be weary of the daily exposures of racism in our city. Why, then, must there be yet another article on this distasteful subject? Because, it is sad to say, fresh outbreaks of that disease seem perpetually to keep one step ahead of the best efforts to stamp it out.

The newest offender, unfortunately, is right here on campus. Its name is Masada.

Masada has been here for several years. It is a glossy and expensive-looking right-wing Zionist publication right-wing distributed in Toronto but usually shunned by anyone looking for serious discussion of contemporary Middle Eastern events. The publishers of this magazine have never been guilty of excessive tenderness toward Muslims in general or Arabs in particular. Lately, however, their polemics against these peoples have taken a distinctly nasty turn.

The first instance of this change is an article called "Chimera in the Middle East" (Masada, vol. 9, no. 1, 1977, pp. 1-3). A few key quotes will illustrate its insulting nature:

"Arabs are not like Philadelphians, nor are they like Frenchmen, nor even Israelis . . . Arabs are religious fanatics devoted to a non-Western warrior religion. Their bequests to us include the words 'assassin' and 'jihad' . . .

"On this earth only the Chinese and the Russians indulge in more wanton slaughter of one another. The Russians and Chinese do it to make their societies more efficient and sequacious; the Arabs do it out of religious fervor . . ." (op. cit., p. 2).

There is much ignorance in these short excerpts, although one could hardly expect otherwise from a man to whom "non-Western" is a mark of opprobrium. It would give a far more accurate picture of the Arab contribution to note that their bequests to us also include such words as "chemistry" and "algebra", to name only two among hundreds, or that the Arabs preserved and developed for us the writings of the ancient Greeks, or again, that they helped to shape not only our own culture but many others, including that of Medieval Judaism, through their influence on language and thought.

Moreover, if Islam is a "warrior religion" (whatever that may be), then which of the monotheistic faiths is not? The Crusades are a well-known example of Christian militancy, and the Hebrew conquest of Canaan is a fact of Biblical history. Nor is it out of place to note that Allah is hardly a pagan tribal deity. Allah in Arabic means God — the same God, it so happens, that is worshipped by Jews and Christians. Do Yahweh or Jesus exult in butchering? No. Nor does Allah.

The bigotry of this article is obvious enough. More dangerous is the most recent article, "An examination of slavery in the Arab World" (Masada, vol. 9, no. 2, 1978, pp. 6-9).

It would be impossible in the space available to describe all the flaws in this article, but it may be instructive to point out a few of the more outstanding ones. To begin with, the picture found on p. 6 of Masada, which one assumes to show Africans being enslaved by Arabs, in fact shows nothing of the kind. Taken without acknowledgement from one of the books cited by the authors (Derrick, Africa's Slaves Today, George Allen and Unwin Ltd., 1975; pictures faces p. 113), the original picture and its caption contain no reference whatever to Arabs.

Masada's use of Derrick's text is no better. Two of the references to this book (note 3 and 15) cannot be found there. And those who may have wondered about the unfootnoted reference to the so-called "slave farm" (Masada, p. 7) which is attributed to Percival-Kaye, will find it on p. 141 of Derrick's book — where the story is referred to as "improbable". In fact, close reading of Derrick's book will show that, in his view, the problem of slavery in Arabia is far less acute than Masada suggests (see, for example, Derrick, p. 234).

Another of the authors' major sources — and a dubious one at that — is a book by O'Callaghan, The Slave Trade (Anthony Blond, 1961). Reviews of this book when it first appeared were harsh, since the book is highly sensationalist and utterly devoid of documentation (see Book Review Digest, 1962, pp. 890-891 for condensed reviews). It now has the additional problem of being woefully outdated. Even this source is mishandled by the Masada authors, however. The quote cited in footnote 12, for example, is taken completely out of context, and that referred to in note 16 is inaccurate.

Much more could be said about both articles, but their tenor should now be evident. What is most disturbing about them is not that they are in themselves bad — although they are certainly that — but that they are so plainly meant to knjure. Their obvious purpose is none other than to slander the Arabs and to do so on the basis of little more than hearsay. It is difficult enough to understand such an attitude at a time when flesh-and-blood Arabs and Israelis are finally negotiating face-to-face. It is surely unthinkable at a time when bigots in our own neighbourhoods are growing bolder, and non-Westerners are in danger of suffering the worst abuse and indignity

Canada's role in the Middle East, small

By NICK MAROTTA

Canada should accommodate itself to playing a marginal role in the negotiations to reach a Middle East peace settlement, according to J. Fraser, the Director of the Middle East Division in the federal Department of External Affairs.

Peace negotiations in the Middle East, according to Fraser, were given a much needed push by Sadat's initiation of "blitzkrieg diplomacy". Whereas negotiations under the Kissinger period displayed a step-by-step approach designed to encroach on the main areas of contention, Sadat's visit brought to the forefront the main critical issues hindering a peace settlement, Fraser said.

One of the main issues of contention is the dispute over Israel's borders, Fraser said. The Egyptian argument is adamant in its assertion that Security Council Resolution 242 calls for the Israelis to withdraw to their 1967 border areas. The Israelis, on the other hand, contend that Resolution 242 allows them to have secure and recognized borders. The Israelis argue that since the 1967 border is not secure, they should be allowed to provide themselves with a stable border.

According to Fraser, Canada believes that the security of any border lies in the free acceptance of the border by people on both sides. It does not, however, agree with the Israelis that a secure border means that the Israelis should expand their borders. Canadian opinion is tempered by the fact that the Israelis are aware of the military requirements in their area.

Another issue is that of settlements, said Fraser. Israeli settlements, not only on the Sinai but on the West Bank pose a threat to peace negotiations. The Israelis argue that the Fourth Geneva Convention does not apply since the movement of population involved is not the kind it prohibits.

According to Fraser, Canada believes the Israelis' argument that expansion of their borders is not justified. Furthermore, this act of expansion is a handicap towards a peace settlement. However, argued Fraser, Canada's position on this issue is tempered by the fact that the Israelis are much more aware of the necessity of a strong border.

The Palestinian question is the remaining area of dispute, said Fraser. During the Six Day War, as well as in 1948, Arabs moved from the West Bank to areas outside Israeli territory. The main stream of the PLO would like an establishment of a Palestinian State in the River Jordan and Gaza Strip area, Fraser said. The Israelis argue that this is an anathema; they refuse to accept the Palestinians in their midst who have not given up the idea of the destruction of the State of Israel, he stated.

The Canadian position is that any peace settlement, if it is to be lasting or just, must deal with the question of the Palestinians. Fraser said. They must be given their territorial foundation for their political self-expression. However Canada cannot become involved in providing constitutional advice in an area where the practical problems have not been worked out.

Canada can only limit her role in the peace settlement negotiations by either providing peace keeping troops or by advising the two contesting nations when called upon. Fraser concluded.

College and University CUTBACKS

Post-secondary education is in a crisis. Provincial funding is not keeping pace with inflation. The allocation for funding to universities for next year will result in increase in class sizes, reduction in library services and forced use of obsolete equipment.

Inadequate STUDENT AID

Under the new plan, students will only be eligible for student aid during their first four years of post-secondary education. Parental contributions will start for families earning $6,600. It would have been $7,600 if OSAP had continued for next year. At least 15,000 students will be cut off from grants.

Threatened UNEMPLOYMENT

How long will you have to wait to get a job? One quarter of last year's graduates were still looking for work six months after completing school. Last summer 25% of students were unemployed. This summer is expected to be worse.

A flagrant example of subliminal seduction; note the picture of two naked men in a telephone booth with a javelin and a loaf of bread. And aren't you glad your name isn't Hurlburt? It isn't fare. Turn to page 11 for details.

A typical day in the life of the Frank family; mother is taking the pillow cases for a walk, sister is teaching the rug to recite Tennyson's "Over the Bar" and brother is writing a letter to Penthouse Forum. Turn to page 16 for the honest and frighteningly explicit details.

Again, note the subliminal seduction; a package of cigarets and a bottle of rye are tattooed on this woman's chest. Sneaky boogers, n'est-ce pas? Turn to page 18 for a description of perverse sexual practices in Chicago. No, really.

U of T d Don Giovanni: students standards approach COC pros

The U of T Opera Department can be proud of this term's production, Don Giovanni. It is quite an achievement to come up with one student cast capable of performing this demanding opera, but to come up with two is outstanding. Certainly, much of the singing on Friday and Saturday nights was as satisfying as many of the COC efforts — and at student prices, who can afford not to go?

Unfortunately, the staging did not always match the professionalism of the singing. For some unknown reason, Don Giovanni was left to shove a cart off stage just before "La ci darem", a cart which the peasants could easily have taken off at their exit, instead of causing this awkward break in the buildup to the duet. Zerlina rushes onstage twice during Elvira's fiery aria, "Ah fuggi il traditor", creating a similar distraction as well as being dramatically illogical. The projections on the scrim between scenes (a technique apparently standard in any Toronto opera production) were also sloppily handled. All of these are small details, to be sure, but it is the minutiae that make the difference between amateur and slick professional productions.

Blair House, who performed so well as the swaggering youth in last term's Albert Herring, turned in a fine interpretation of the Don. He appeared, as yet, to be in awe of the role and, consequently, treated some arias too cautiously (notably "Fin ch'han dal vino"). Gino Quilico, as the opening night lead, seemed more at ease in the part, singing with better control and genuine bravado. Both served as credible rakes, displaying the endearing and despicable qualities of Giovanni with conviction.

Leporello's role was approached from two different angles, each proving effective in its own right. Joel Katz, taller and less agile than opening night's Christopher Cameron, was relatively dignified in his interpretation, when compared to Cameron's overt slapstick treatment. Nothing of the comedy was lost, however, and both sang extremely well.

The only role which suffered from glaring discrepancies in performing quality was that of Don Ottavio. Mark Dubois, with his gloriously lyrical voice, was able to transform a relatively dull role into one of the opera's musical highlights. With such competition, it is understandable that Michael Shust should play a poor second.

The remaining male roles were largely a toss-up for the better performer. Robert Grenier's Commendatore was slightly more resonant than that of Christopher Cameron, while Rod Campbell and Brian Benn's Masettos were equally uninspired.

Carolyn Tomlin as Zerlina and Gino Quilico as the Don.

As for the women's roles, one couldn't help but feel that a combination of the good qualities presented on both nights might produce an ideal group of ladies. The opening night selection of Heather Wilberforce, Kathy Terrell and Carolyn Tomlin were generally stronger singers, but the acting was better from the next night's Deborah Jeans, Janet Coates and Susan Lauher. Ms. Jeans was particularly successful, dramatically, as Donna Anna, investing her character with great dignity. Donna Elvira's function in the opera was treated a little too comically, and Ms. Terrell tended to be overly coy in her presentation. The coyness was just perfect, however, in Susan Lauher's Zerlina and one only regretted that she frequently couldn't be heard.

The orchestra sadly lagged behind the high quality of the singers. Timing and tuning problems were noticeable on numerous occasions, but nothing so grave as to spoil the beauty of the performances on stage. That beauty was visual as well as aural, thanks to the superb costumes and sets.

You probably read last week Leonard Treash's defence of producing the opera in English translation. Certainly, most of the comic moments would have been lost in Italian, but the Martins' English version created some humorous sequences which did not exist in the original, particularly in the graveyard scene. In addition, some of the subtle ambiguities of the da Ponte libretto were forfeited to make a more flowing English version. However, the translation, for the most part, was commendable and, when delivered with the excellent diction of this performance, made the work more accessible for the general audience.

NBC bares Bottom, shows cute ass

Thank goodness she was spared the long blonde wig Vanessa Harwood and Karen Kain have to wear when they dance Titania.

However, while the role calls for restraint (albeit restraint laced with a challenging aggressiveness), Tennant danced with something closer to caution. The seemingly slight hesitation in her steps created a fluttering, as opposed to fluid, movement which only emphasized her caution and increased the already present tension in the audience. Obviously a great many people were concerned or curious about her return to the stage.

James Kudelka, filling in for Schaufuss, raced back and forth across the stage as Oberon, practically blurring whatever there was to see. At times it seemed he had forgotten about dancing and taken up the hop, step and jump. The Dream is a compact, linear ballet. The plot moves very quickly and there is little room for any dramatic development. A successful performance depends on a constant pace which allows the action to build upon itself. Neither Tennant nor Kudelka were able to find or maintain this essential pace Wednesday night.

Of course much of the fun focuses on Bottom after he has been transformed into the donkey of Titania's desire(!). Cute, cuddly and on point Bottom easily steals the show. If the National could get a doll modelled after this half man-half donkey on the market in time for next Christmas they would surely have a few less financial worries.

David Gornik's Bottom Wednesday night was a real donkey! (That's a compliment, David.) I'm sure some in the audience were tempted to go backstage after his performance with cubes of sugar or whatever it is that donkeys eat after dancing in ballets. On Thursday night Victor Edwards was almost, but not quite, as convincing. Don't ever let anyone tell you one donkey is as good as another!

The four lovers wandering through the forest bring a touch of vaudeville with them. Colleen Cool is especially entertaining as first the coldly rejected, and then, the hotly pursued Helena.

Both David Allan and Daniel Capouch miss the mark as Puck. Allan is too boyish while Capouch is devilish, sometimes bordering on sinister. Puck should be danced with a little more mischief, like a young punk who knows he'll get off on probation for a first offense.

The Dream was not as immediately successful as the National's other Ashton ballets. Although there is seldom a pause or a moment when something isn't happening in The Dream (and some might criticize Ashton for attempting to put too much in too small a space) when the curtain comes down the ballet seems strangely incomplete. The National's production suffered from the lack of an all-encompassing rhythm and much of the ballet's intended lightness failed to surface.

Antigone in South Africa

A sun so large, so hot, so yellow that men's sweat dries on their bodies. A landscape barren as the minds of the men who dig and quarry it. A world of sand, brutality and despair, bounded by the sea which separates them from the little sense of self they have ever had. Robben's Island, prison for political prisoners, off the coast of the Union of South Africa.

Athol Fugard's brutal and compelling play, The Island, about the life of the conscience in South Africa, and the fate which awaits it, is receiving a striking production at TWP. Fugard quietly left South Africa — without the official permission he is required to have in order to travel—and attended with approval its opening performance. His play is directed by a black, and has a cast of two black men in it and all are deeply involved in the cause of change in South Africa. None of their political sentiments ruins or distorts the production as a work of art.

Instead, their intensity simply heightens the experience of the viewer.

As do many of Fugard's plays, The Island bases its political punch on a Greek myth—in this case, the story of Antigone, who has violated the state's regulations in the name of a greater human concern. Her brother sought to overthrow the state and as a consequence is not allowed decent obsequies; she proudly buries him. In Fugard's play, a reproduction of the trial scene from Sophocles' Antigone is at the heart of the relationship between his two characters, Winston, who has burnt his passport and been sentenced to life imprisonment, and John, a teacher who has been arrested on a conspiracy charge, jailed for ten years, but had his sentence reduced to three years and is about to be released. The two have been cell-mates for all of John's sentence.

From the fragments lodged in his mind, John intends to recreate

Antigone's defense against Creon in a prisoner's concert. It is, simply, the cry of the black South African against the state. The trial is the climactic moment in the play, as a black Antigone, played with desperate courage by Winston, speaks directly across cultural gulfs, as did the original Greek myth. Fugard's dramaturgical skill is apparent; the essential humanity which speaks is more effective than the polemics of Creon, who attempts to refute it.

The Island is an indictment of a repressive system; more importantly, it is a celebration of human qualities. It is a play which is well-wrought, and because of its construction a viewer can relax into emotional reactions. It is not simple, nor does it pose solutions; it describes in intense and powerful detail the other side of Paarl sherry and the raw beauty of the Cape. Take the trouble to be moved.

Bergman out of gas

For years, for a span of almost two decades, Ingmar Bergman made extraordinary films that won critical acclaim and small but dedicated audiences. Lately his films have drawn ever-larger crowds, but his gifts seem to run in inverse proportion to his popularity. Not all of the bad films he has made in the last dozen years have made money, but none of the films that have done the kind of box office which is able to attract an aesthetically barren money-hound like Dino de Laurentiis as producer have been good, and the two most popular, Scenes from a Marriage and The Magic Flute are, cinematically speaking, the very worst. Scenes from a Marriage was not an absolutely unworthy achievement. The script of tough, passionate and insightful but the film is cinematically empty. It would have worked vastly better as a stage play. The Magic Flute is simply a disgrace.

And now The Serpent's Egg with its forty-four different flavours of angst. It's damned puzzling. All the reviewers have been talking about the unrelieved bleakness of the film, which some have praised and others disparaged. But when bleakness is as easygoing as this, how does it qualify as bleakness? When despair is as cozy as a warm fire and a blanket, in what sense is it despair? And when you have to get as heavy-handed as Bergman is here to make your point about the abyss of the human condition even when your raw material is one of the most awesome and horrifying atrocities of contemporary history, in what sense can you be said to have any vision at all?

In this film you see a man in the morgue who's been hit by a truck, his body is bathed in red. In case you haven't gotten the point an attendant holds up a bucket of guts for the camera to study at leisure before setting it down. And you yawn. What the devil is going on? In 1956 Bergman made a film about the abyss of the human condition, The Seventh Seal. There's almost no blood in that one, and certainly no rats being laid to rest lovingly on garbage cans, and The Seventh Seal lives in the memory with a ferocity, a poetry and power, that The Serpent's Egg doesn't have two minutes after leaving the theatre. It's revolting to watch a film about the conditions that led to Nazism in Germany which is so perfunctory, so touristy in its horror. From that bloody bucket of guts to the dead rat slung on the garbage can just slowly enough, and held in the viewfinder just long enough for the slowest person in the audience to catch it and say "Oh! horrors!", the whole schmozzle has the look of snapshots taken by a British husband and wife having a jolly little day trip to some points of interest in the inferno. It's insulting to be asked to react to this candy-ass little odyssey as if it were serious treatment of the national horror in pre-Nazi Germany and even more insulting to read reviewers wondering if Bergman is not too bleak here. Especially when a film with real insight into the Nazi horror such as The Night Porter was metaphorically spat upon by the entire North American critical community and labelled pornography. If this is now the best Bergman can do then, with all due respect and honour to his early achievements, it is by God past time he died up and blew away.

Sweet: fey bikers

The Sweet is one of those bands destined to perch ominously on the brink of success forever. Their first stab at easy living came in the early seventies when a string of mildly metallic bubblegummers like "Willie Willie (Won't Go Home)" boosted their heavenward in their native Limeyland and prompted encouraging ripples on these more civilized shores. Their big problem (as far as making it here, where the big cashflow is), was their confusing incongruity. While playing songs of this ilk, the group's persona was that of fey biker psychos, which was only a mildly amusing gimmick anyway.

Well they're back again, and it's "three strikes you're out" with Level Headed. Still unhealthy looking (this time it seems to be quasi-disco-tough), they've latched onto serio-morbozo spew-in-the-grooves by mating Queen's production aesthetics with Fleetwood Mac senti-mentality. Along the way they blatantly rip-off Lou Reed, Sparks, Queen, 10CC, Tubular Bells, Styx, Hamilton-Joe-Frank & Reynolds, the Ohio Players and Mozart, which may be a record of sorts and would make a good resume on a talent agent's list of clients, but says nothing for the Sweet's creative powers. These guys are mindless and should stick to that type of music which they do well.

All the while they've resorted to the standard bag of tricks of bands eager to divest themselves of hard rock images: multiple in-song rhythm change-ups, plentiful overdubs, artsy-fartsy synthesizer sound and even classical music.

The one redeeming feature on the album is the last cut "Air Space on a Tape Loop" which is a likely candidate to become the soundtrack for a film of the "Blas-Ox vs. the Death Rats from Mars" breed. It's as close as they come to conjuring up some of the tuneful brainbroth they churned out on the previous album, but it's no excuse to blow OSAP on this disc.

Level Headed just may nab them a sizable gaggle of new fans, while it's a certainty to cut them off from their earlier ones. However gratifying that may be in the short run, attracting new followers at the expense of old ones is no way to build a career.

BeBop: white noise

Be Bop Deluxe is one of those bands that tries to straddle the line between technical 'yes-I-know-I'm-great-and-therefore-don't-care-about-the-planet-Earth' virtuosity and 'gut-crunching-drinkin'-and-pokin' rock'n roll. Now, there's nothing wrong with trying to bring intelligence and technical razzle-dazzle to the admittedly simple rock'n'roll form, and Be Bop does it better than most bands, but it can make for a confusing hodge-podge.

Witness the band's latest album, Drastic Plastic (wryly imbedded in white vinyl). Bill Nelson, the lead singer-guitarist-song-writer-messiah, likes to surround his nebulous lyrics with both electronic dribblings and hard rock riffs. The standard Be Bop song, then, has a display of guitar or synthesizer silliness followed by a moment of silence in which Billy whispers some poignant catch line into the mike followed by a chugging guitar and bass line. It can get tedious.

Unfortunately the new album follows this formula almost to a tee. The best songs are, not surprisingly, the few that manage to avoid this repetition. "Dangerous Stranger" is a nice cross between fairly intelligent lyrics and a fiftyish "Summertime Blues" progression. "Japan" is an uncharacteristically lyrical number (melodies have never been Bill's strong point) about, funniest thing, the Orient. Most of the other songs have their moments, usually to be found in a solo (all the band members are very competent musicians), but they lack coherency.

So I don't know. Be Bop appeals to those who can't make up their mind about what style of rock they prefer. And maybe that's a good thing. But I don't trust a band that straddles fences. At least until they prove themselves a rule unto themselves. And Be Bop has taken a step in the opposite direction with this album.

Starz: buyers beware

Attention Shoppers is the third album from Starz, one of the minor league bands in the Kiss division. Their first two discs contained some competent rock'n'roll, but perhaps were best remembered for compassionate love songs about kidney machines and subway violence. Both records were engineered by Aerosmith producer Jack Douglas, who tends to treat a sound board like a cement mixer.

In this their third effort, the band has done the production chores themselves. In fact they probably did everything themselves: the cover design is painfully bad and the title is horrendous. The first time I listened to the album I sneered all the way through. The second time I actually fell asleep.

Starz's brand of music revolves around twin lead guitars and a powerhouse rhythm section. Nothing too original, but once in a while it works. On this album there are two dynamite singles, one above average ballad, three tracks of filler, one childishly simple "message" song, and two pathetic rockers. There's something for everyone here.

The potential 45's are "Hold On To The Night" and "I'll Be There", both of which show off Starz at their best: crisp percussion by Joe X. Dube, melodic guitar work by Brenden Harken and Richi Ranno, and a singer with the biggest set of lips this side of Mick Jagger. If the rest of the album was as strong, Starz would be the biggest thing since Boston.

Unfortunately the other tunes show up the seamy side of Starz. The low point must be "Good Ale We Seek", believe it not a song about a fantasy world covered in beer. There's also a song about a young prostitute and her man. It's a seven and a half minute song that's seven minutes too long.

Attention Shoppers is just another album from just another band. There are rumours that Starz will soon release a Greatest Hits package, a limited edition E.P. on black vinyl. Until then they don't deserve promotion into the first division.

Steeleye: storm blows

After listening to Steeleye Span's posthumously released disc, Storm Force Ten, I cannot mourn the recent break-up of the group. The new album indicates that they had reached the point where they were merely repeating themselves, and doing so with less than usual skill.

Violinist Peter Knight and guitarist Bob Johnson had already left the group, taking with them much of the group's instrumental prowess and arranging ability. Their replacements — Martin Carthy and John Kilpatrick — seem to have done little to revitalize the group, though the latter's accordion does provide an interesting deviation from normal folk-rock instrumentation.

Steeleye's strong point has always been its strongpoint, and the few memorable moments on the new release are in this vein. But lead vocalist Maddy Prior has lost much of the attractive fragility of her voice, it being replaced by a sort of strident tone.

If the vocals are weak, then words cannot do injustice to the instrumentation. The arrangements show no imagination, but are mere reworkings of songs they have done better in the past. The band's breakup may be the best; now the individual members can move on to new things rather than try to recreate past projects.

A guide to Toronto's bar bands

The good, the bad and the noisy: every Saturday, Paul and the boys. . .

This is the city. Within its seamy limits there are over four thousand performing bands. And the vast majority of them are bad. Very bad.

But amidst the squeaking squalor of the big cabbage, a few gems lurk. And, if you are careful, it is possible to spend under five dollars hearing some good music while getting reasonably intoxicated. But it isn't easy.

With the hope of making this indefatigable pursuit of the unattainable perfection a little fairer, to balance the odds in favour of the average economically oppressed university student, the Varsity Review has employed dozens of dedicated critics and expended hundreds of man hours to bring you this guide to the bar bands in this city.

It's not perfect, but then what is in this Woolworth's world? It is only a start. Properly employed, it can work as a rule of thumb to the best and worst of the regularly appearing music machines in this city. And if it saves someone a bit of time, a few dollars or just a disappointment, then it has done its job. And we've done ours.

The temperature inside the club was sickeningly high as the Hunt churned out another song. It had been thirty minutes of gut-wrenching visceral noise. The bass player, dripping with perspiration, approached the microphone and screamed hoarsely "do ya want to rock n' roll now?" The crowd roared their approval. The easy listening set was over.

The Hunt came together in December of 1976 when three members of Dillinger and one from Max Webster joined forces. An album entitled The Hunt was recorded that month and then the band started playing every bar in the city.

The music is archetypal heavy metal: four musicians who can play their instruments and who like to play them loud. Drummer Paul Kersey is a showman who beats his drum kit into submission, while keyboard man Jacques Harrison adds to the sound with saxophone and flute. They use only their own material, except for the occasional 'classic' which creeps in during their set.

Their music is a throwback to the heyday of Deep Purple and Uriah Heep. The Hunt might have been big back in '72. As it is now 1978, they're hanging on to yesterday.

This week they're supporting Mahogany Rush in Texas and like Moxy, Triumph, and Rush, they'll probably love them down there. Back in Toronto, there's no such time warp.

southern cross

Australia, the land down under, is gaining a reputation for far more than just koala bears and kangaroos. Right now their hottest export commodity is rock bands, and Southern Cross is the most recent to hit the high seas, destined for North America.

Last fall this five man ensemble, then known as Greg Quill and Hot Knives, opened as sound check for The Little River Band, another Aussie group. For a mere twenty minute session, the Massey Hall audience gave Quill a standing ovation, and right then all the signs were pointing in the right direction for their future in Canada. Since then however, a few changes have taken place — a new name, a new man, and some new material, have lightened up their presentation to a great degree.

And what is so attractive about this band is that they plan to display their talents around and about the various clubs in the area.

Quill, as the 'leader' has an established reputation in Australia with several albums to his credit — his lyrical talent cannot be disputed, but it is those with whom he has surrounded himself that is going to make the impact. The four Australians and an English expatriot, are Sam See, formerly of Lighthouse, Chris Stockley, the new man, late of Australia's Dingoes, drummer Tony Bolton and the lone 'Brit', Dennis Pinhorn. Definitely an experienced set of individuals.

Southern Cross rely heavily on several electric guitars and a hefty bass rhythm. See is a superb musician, instrumentally more so than vocally. He has a deft manner of coaxing his guitar to a high level of performance, something that strongly sets up Quill and his thought-provoking vocals. The bass player, Pinhorn, is probably the most energetic, and Stockley adds an unconventional dimension to the already varied repertoire, by occasionally stooping to pick up and pluck at a mandolin.

A week ago, at Basin Street, the band threw union rules to the wind, returning to treat the audience to an encore — something very rare indeed in a club environment. When the media, who comprised most of the crowd that night, stays until the draught runs dry, you can be assured this is one bar band that is only biding their time before taking the concert plunge. But for the moment Southern Cross will be around this area; catch them before the price of a concert ticket becomes a deterrent. It's the best bargain around.

If there's one thing that this sleepy burg is carving out its own little niche in the Great Kosmic Karma with (besides tall buildings and short mayors), it's our seeming affinity, nay, demon-like zeal for coughing up, supporting and drop-kicking to the top of the international rockpile three man power outfits. Rush has made it. Triumph is on its way. Countless others slave away in the sleazy beer slinging puke pits that form the nexus of Toronto's current bar scene.

But look out. It's time to hunker down and get serious about this whole situation. Clear out the clowns. Wipe out the wimps. Dump on the disco-dux. Make a little room, correction, they'll make their own room and a lot of it, because here comes the Next Big Thing From Trawna primed and ready to blow big like a zit on the pushed in puss of one of the countless jillions of slag-brained write-offs numbered among their slavish thronging fans: it is time for Goddo. (Goddo was last seen in these parts tussling Gorgonzola in a 2 out of 3 slugfest to decide the King of the Japanese horror flick bozos.) Actually, these three teen titans (Greg Godovitz serving up brain throbs bass bleats with side dishes of acrimony; Gino Scarpelli on insect death-rattle lead guitar; and Doug Inglis with tender loving drum destruction, all of whose Clearasil daze are long gone but it's the spirit that counts anyway) don't squash hapless critters underfoot and don't growl in Nipponese, but the way they purposefully lumber around a stage no one notices the difference.

"We came, we saw, we bludgeoned" is an apt motto for their performance style. They've broken local records for the number of times they've been ordered to turn down their amps by club managers with a keen appreciation of their buildings structural weaknesses in the face of sonic churn. Even Goddo's more laid-back brain-scratches send less hardy souls scuttling for cover. Tender tympanums beware! And we're not just talking sheer volume here either. The essence of the situation is raw intensity, something they've been hoarding just for such an occasion as music's current equivalent of the Great Depression.

Wimps shouldn't even try to play such music and these boys are strictly behemoths of the first stripe (Godovitz himself is a walking 5 by 5). Their posturing is brute effectiveness non-pareil. By combining this with some of the most truly abrasive walls of noise to be found today; cerebrum weld lead guitar; Godovitz' honest-to-goodness writing talents, leering slime-lizard crooning and high school sense of humour, and underlining the whole package with a philosophy that raises the concept of cheery mindlessness to an ethos of quasi-religious fervour, Goddo has, in about as short a span as you could ask for, earned solid fan backing, good press, a couple of albums and are now ready for their shot at Rock Godhood.

Catch them soon in the grunge hole of your choice. The day is coming when you and 18,000 other tissue-headed peons will cough up premium bucks to catch their heavy metal hijinks, cum human sacrifice show in a night of fun, frolic and drug abuse at Happy Harold's Carlton Street Funhouse.

Anti-consciousness music gained a foothold in the higher-priced clubs of Toronto as The Diodes took over the upstairs of the El Mocambo on March 3 and 4. Although they are not, as singer Paul Robinson claimed onstage, the first new Wave act in the El Mocambo (The Poles have played there at least once before), they can readily be granted several other "firsts". Certainly they are the loudest, the hardest and possibly fastest act to grace that particular stage.

Another "first" must surely be the fact that CHUM-FM taped Friday night's set for their "live" broadcast show "Night at Eleven". This momentous night of "firsts" would not be complete without saying that it was the first time I have heard the Diodes sound as good as their album. Much of the responsibility for that no doubt lies with the completion of both American and British tours. Reversing one's usual expectations, this was the first time that I had heard those qualities of the Diodes that everyone else had been telling me about for so long. Friday night they were a tight, disciplined unit, executing their musical cues with precision. Guitarist John Catto has finally perfected his Peter Townshend jumps and if Paul Robinson still uses the same four facial expressions no one there cared.

The Diodes at the El Mocambo served to underline that this self-admitted "imitation of an imitation of a punk band" is a middle-class band playing for middle-class people at a middle-class bar. Even their new material (which thankfully sounds as strong as the old) pointedly reminds us of that. The Diodes may be a band we can grow up with, if they can continue to remind us of who we are.

Long ago and far away, in the middle of an endless opening act, the exasperated punk-rockers at the table next to me stood up and chanted "Rock and roll is boring!" Never was this statement truer than last Wednesday night at the El Mocambo.

Toronto's Madcats, formerly Fullerton Dam, struggled earnestly to rouse the medium-sized crowd into a frenzy of musical appreciation. But their ho-hum brand of rock'n'roll was neither driving enough to blast us into oblivion nor distinctive enough to be interesting. The deceptive cheers from the audience were inspired more by countless rounds of alcohol than by any musical dynamism.

The band members' impressive credentials led us to expect much more than they delivered. Glen Gratto's drumming, Grant Fullerton's guitar and vocals were all merely competent. John Eidman's bass playing was simplistic and predictable. His many-hours-in-front-of-the-mirror-look-at-me-I'm-a-rock-star facial contortions and deep-knee bends did nothing to mask the music's elemental banality.

The show was not without its moments: Brad Macdonald's textured, Argent-ian keyboard work was a high point, as were Bobby Blake's glass-shattering vocals. There was a spark of freshness and originality to be gleaned in more melodic songs like "Free Wheelin'". But these hints of promise were lost in the general tedium.

Madcats is not a bad band. But then so what? There are scores of bands around that are not bad. Their safe, familiar rock was inoffensive; it was also unimaginative and, for the most part, thoroughly uninspiring.

There are three places in this city where you can find hot jazz, that blend of traditional, Dixieland and swing that everybody except the most haughty and discriminating jazz aficionado enjoys. They are the Brunswick, in the form of Dr. McJazz, DJ's, in the form of the Climax Jazz Band and Grossman's in the shape of the Louisiana Joymakers.

Now the Brunswick is no place to go to listen to music. And if it was, you can be assured that Dr. McJazz wouldn't play there. Noise is a blessing when that group's on stage. The Climax Jazz Band has long been vaunted as the best traditional jazz band in the city. Funniest thing about that, the Climax hasn't played jazz in years. They play a slick, toned-down, amusing banality that passes for jazz but is in fact background music for the DJ pickup crowd.

That leaves the Joymakers at Grossman's on Spadina. Peter Savory, the band's leader and guiding spirit is himself a former member of the Climax. He left that ensemble when it began its slide into muzak, to form his own band. The Joymakers are a seven-man New Orleans (not Dixieland) style jazz band. All the members are more than competent on their instruments but Bruce Bakewell on clarinet and Kid Bastien on drums stand out. The band has recently been appointed the house band for the Toronto Dixieland society.

So look, Grossman's is a dive, but more people go there to listen to the music than half the pubs on Yonge St. The beer is cheap, there's no cover and every Friday and Saturday, the Joymakers are there in fine force. No seriously, if this band doesn't get around to recording an album, I'm bringing a cassette machine down there on the weekend.

nightwinds

GENUS: ROCERIX
SPECIE: PROGRESSIVICUS

A pale-skinned humanoid creature usually found roaming in herds of four or five. Two sub-species are known, one native to North America, Rocerix Progressivus Jazzicus, and the other seen mostly in Europe, Progressivus Rocerix Classicus. The latter can be recognized by its blow-dry hair, brightly-coloured but loose-fitting outer garments while any written data on these herds always refers to the classical training of the keyboards player.

Surprisingly enough, a herd closely resembling the European sub-specie has been discovered in this area. Referred to as Nightwinds, observers are surprised by their presence in an area heavily populated by Rocerix Heavus Metallicus. Their survival in this inhospitable environment can be traced to their ability to mimic the sounds of the well-known Genesis and other similar herds found in Great Britain. In addition, their survival instincts have led them to create many new sounds of their own, of course heavily influenced by their Anglo-counterparts.

Their instrumental ability ranges from adequate (keyboards and guitar) to excellent (percussion and bass), while their vocalist provides some much-needed showmanship. With this city's well-demonstrated love for Genesis, and that band's recent demise (or at least deterioration), Nightwinds should prove a much-welcomed substitute.

wooden teeth

It is hard describing a band like Wooden Teeth. They play blues, jazz, rock, progressive jazz, jazz-rock, blues-jazz-rock, and reggae. The lead singer probably is an expert juggler to boot, but we'll never know. The point is, however, that Wooden Teeth can play each genre with equal expertise. In a city where most bar bands are into bad punk or white noise, it's a pleasant surprise to find some musical expertise and variety.

The worst thing about the band is their name. The rest is all good. At present the outfit is a five-piece, though there are plans to add a horn section and a keyboard player. Last week at the Midwich Cuckoo, they opened with an instrumental, one of those free form affairs in which each member goes his own trip. Usually it's enough to make you want to hit the hard stuff, but not this time.

Singer Michael Pickett combines mouth harp with some raspy vocals. The man has a perfect voice for the blues; during the day he probably picks cotton. Elsewhere, guitarist John Tilden alternates between melodic leads and picking up on the rhythm section. The musicians have all played with respected ensembles before Wooden Teeth, ranging from Bo Diddley to Cueball to Domenic Troiano. Together the band pools their schizo musical background into some of the funkier rhythm'n'blues this city has been graced with in years.

A standout in their set is Robert Palmer's "Sneaking Sally Through The Alley", where the band manages to retain the Little Feat feel of the original. An original reggae tune entitled "Compromise" soon became one of those melodies that you whistle in the showers for weeks on end. Finally saxophonist Rick Morrison executed the coup de grace with a rendition of "Europa", the Carlos Santana song made famous by Gato Barbieri. The audience at the Cuckoo went wild.

All in all, a band that may just go somewhere. There's plenty of music here for dancers, drinkers, and rhythm'n'blues aficionados.

Underground art: paint on the tracks

A predicted twenty-five deaths by subway this year in Toronto... No, not the suicidal plunges we're used to, but the accidental toppling of art patrons who heedlessly flock to see subway art.

Are we to assume that the flash new Spadina subway line is receiving payoffs from the ZPG committee and are we prepared to support this with our token dollar? And anyway, who wanted a remake on the usual Spadina associations of "ethnic, quaint, and smelly"?

All levity aside, the size of the new subway art work, although proportional to the given space, is often too large to be understood while standing on the platform, unless you back up just enough... So if the work is on the walls, you'd be wise to look across the tracks; chances are it will be duplicated on the other side. If it's part of the ceiling you lose out too. Of the two ceiling pieces, Rita Letendre's Joy at Glencairn and Michael Hayden's Arc en Ciel at Yorkdale can only be appreciated either by looking back over your shoulder while ascending the Up escalator, in the first case, or from the outside while driving past in your car, in the second case.

Granted, the tubular shape of a subway station doesn't lend itself to living room art, nor can you hope to reach all of the subway patrons all of the time. If it's too pop, it encourages graffitiophiles to add their two cents. If it swings toward straight representational art like Joyce Wieland's pillowy Barren Ground Caribou at Spadina's North Entrance, it doesn't belong in a subway and is moved up to the mezzanine floor.

By far the best solution has been Michelangelo's — in Rita Letendre's striped station-length skylight called Joy. Despite the fact that its ideal perspective point is somewhere on the escalator between the subway and mezzanine floors, it blends structurally into the architecture itself and has a stunningly macabre effect for those standing directly below it. We all know Letendre for her striped mural high on the exterior western wall of Neill Wyck and wonder, how did she get up there and why a big black stripe in the middle?

The answer is in her subway ceiling. From below a series of orange, black and green stripes allow light to filter in, but seem to be arbitrarily arranged. The effect is harsh and the overall associations are of Halloween colours. However, all is transformed into a misty pastel haze, as you move to the second floor and discover that all the stripes appear to converge at the far end of the ceiling. Letendre has eliminated the sober, negative aspects of the colour black. Black can now mean Joy. The illusion is technically superb, and highly commendable when it is taken into consideration that during the construction, many of the skylight plates were blown off and smashed.

The other ceiling piece is Michael Hayden's Arc en Ciel. Although the internal effect has been cramped and obscured by architect Arthur Erikson's decision to place looming pillars down the length of the station, Hayden gives most of the thrills to the driving public. His series of arched neon tubes of progressive prismatic colours light up in succession as a train enters the station. From the outside it looks like a 5000-point bonus hole in a pinball game. And this may very well be the intention of many of the artists for the Spadina Line. Life is a game in which the petty anxieties of getting from point A to point B on time are worthless distractions. The intrinsic wonder of being able to journey rapidly to the heart of Toronto without actually moving (from your seat) is a recurrent theme.

Gerald Zeldin's Summertime Street Car at Eglinton West plays on this illusory aspect of transportation. In two duplicate murals, each 600 feet square and made of porcelain enamel on steel, he simulates graphically the visual snapshots we perceive while watching an approaching train. The idea is old but the treatment is colourful. I can't help but see a latent tribute to Andy Warhol.

St. Clair station has another mural of porcelain enamel mosaic but it is probably too perishable to last under the probing fingers of short people. The artist has made good use of the shine on the ceiling to provide a watery reflection of the mural. Again the best effect is obtained from the Up escalator to the mezzanine.

Claude Breeze has so successfully incorporated his Spacing Aerial Highways into the structure of the street-level station, that it is hard to find, but once there, is worth the effort. Its appeal is more intellectual than many of the art pieces, perhaps because of its proximity to an area of upper class housing. James Sutherland, on the other hand, has resurrected the sixties with two large mosaic floral designs on either side of the tracks at Dupont. Entitled Spadina Summer Under All Seasons, it expresses more simply the theme of joy suggested in Letendre's ceiling. Set against a background of small salmon-coloured tiles, the artwork marks a radical change from the terse, squared-off lines which are typical of TTC.

But they've gone one step more. TTC Car No. 5780 has been transformed into a gallery on wheels. Replacing the old chocolate and pantyhose ads are fifty transparent colour photographs in a roving exhibition called Rolling Landscape. Car 5780 will be on the regular subway routes until March 22. With surreal pieces by Thaddeus Holownia, Isobel Harry, and Ben Mark Holzberg, as well as work by twelve other Canadian artists, you may very well miss your stop.

Our culture dosage is being steadily increased by the TTC, supposedly to avoid 'dosage'. The popular newspaper and novel are being phased out for the sake of fleeting aesthetic moments. We now have a Tube of abstract expressionism. If we can all squeeze in, there may be something for everyone's palate.

Julius Schmid would like to give you some straight talk about condoms, rubbers, sheaths, safes, French letters, storkstoppers.

All of the above are other names for prophylactics. One of the oldest and most effective means of birth control known and the most popular form used by males. Apart from birth control, use of the prophylactic is the only method officially recognized and accepted as an aid in the prevention of transmission of venereal disease.

Skin Prophylactics.

Skin prophylactics made from the membranes of lambs were introduced in England as early as the eighteenth century. Colloquially known as "armour", used by Cassanova, and mentioned in classic literature by Richard Boswell in his "London Journal" (where we read of his misfortune from not using one), they continue to be used and increase in popularity to this very day.

Because they are made from natural membranes, "skins" are just about the best conductors of body warmth money can buy and therefore their effect on sensation and feeling is almost insignificant.

Rubber Prophylactics

The development of the latex rubber process in the twentieth century made it possible to produce strong rubber prophylactics of exquisite thinness, with an elastic ring at the open end to keep the prophylactic from slipping off the erect penis. Now these latex rubber prophylactics are available in a variety of shapes and colours, either plain-ended, or tipped with a "teat" or "reservoir end" to receive and hold ejaculated semen.

Lubrication

And thanks to modern chemistry, several new non-reactive lubricants have been developed so that prophylactics are available in either non-lubricated or lubricated forms. The lubricated form is generally regarded as providing improved sensitivity, as is, incidentally, the NuForm® Sensi-Shape. For your added convenience, all prophylactics are pre-rolled and ready-to-use.

Some Helpful Hints

The effectiveness of a prophylactic, whether for birth control or to help prevent venereal disease, is dependent in large measure upon the way in which it is used and disposed of. Here are a few simple suggestions that you may find helpful.

Packaging

First of all, there's the matter of packaging. Skin prophylactics are now packaged premoistened in sealed aluminum foil pouches to keep them fresh, dependable and ready for use. Latex rubber prophylactics are usually packaged in sealed plasticized paper pouches or aluminum foil.

All of these prophylactics, at least those marketed by reputable firms, are tested electronically and by other methods to make sure they are free of defects. Prophylactics are handled very carefully during the packaging operation to make sure they are not damaged in any way.

Prophylactic Shapes

Storage and Handling

It is equally important that you store and handle them carefully after you buy them, if you expect best results and dependability. For example, don't carry them around in your wallet in your back pocket and sit on them from time to time. This can damage them and make them worthless. Next is the matter of opening the package. It's best to tear the paper or foil along one edge so that the simple act of tearing doesn't cause a pinhole. And of course, one should be particularly careful of sharp fingernails whenever handling the prophylactic.

Putting Them On

The condom, or prophylactic, should be put on before there is any contact between the penis and the vaginal area. This is important, as it is possible for small amounts of semen to escape from the penis even before orgasm.

Unroll the prophylactic gently onto the erect penis, leaving about a half of an inch projecting beyond the tip of the penis to receive the male fluid (semen). This is more easily judged with those prophylactics that have a reservoir end. The space left at the end or the reservoir, should be squeezed while unrolling, so that air is not trapped in the closed end.

As mentioned earlier, you may wish to apply a suitable lubricant either to the vaginal entrance or to the outside surface of the prophylactic, or both, to make entry easier and to lessen any risk of the prophylactic tearing.

Taking Them Off

When sexual relations are completed, withdraw the penis while the erection is still present, holding the rim of the prophylactic until withdrawal is complete, so as to stop any escape of semen from the prophylactic as well as to stop it from slipping off. Remove the prophylactic and, as an added precaution, use soap and water to wash the hands, penis and surrounding area and also the vaginal area to help destroy any traces of sperm or germs.

And now for a commercial.

As you've read this far you're probably asking yourself who makes the most popular brands of prophylactics in Canada?

The answer to that is Julius Schmid. And we'd like to take this opportunity to introduce you to six of the best brands of prophylactics that money can buy. They're all made by Julius Schmid. They're all electronically tested to assure dependability and quality. And you can only buy them in drug stores.

Urban landscapes backdrop for Charney's sculptures

Melvin Charney labels himself an "artist-architect". The term, he says, is convenient because in Canada an artist is accepted as "a crazy fool." However, the name also illustrates Charney's attempts to merge the role of artist and architect in order to explore the function and meaning of architecture, especially within the context of the city.

Other Monuments 1970-77, a collection of Charney's works over the last seven years, is now on display at the Art Gallery of Ontario. His latest project, Streetwork, has to be viewed from both inside and outside the gallery. The hundred foot arcade intersects the wall of the gallery and extends out towards Dundas St. The street end is only the skeleton of the structure which builds up piece by piece until it meets the wall. Inside it breaks down again into blocks and then skeleton. The medium is raw wood, "because it's cheap," and it will weather gradually.

Although he identifies himself with Quebec geographically and emotionally, Charney feels that he is primarily a North American artist. Fragments presents the image of a house in Trois-Rivieres which was part of Charney's 1975 project, "Le Tresor de Trois-Rivieres." Charney sees it as "probably the sole architectural image of the North American frontier", one which can be seen both in Quebec or Texas. He also finds in the facade the lines of a temple or sarcophagus.

Charney attracted considerable notice at the Montreal Olympics in 1976. He "was responsible for Corridart, a five-mile museum extending down Sherbrooke Street. It was meant to illustrate the life of the street as an integral part of the urban consciousness. Set up along the route were photographic displays of events which were part of the history of the street, including a St. Jean-Baptiste Day parade and a royal visit. Red plastic hands with pointing fingers indicated the route and singled out houses of interest. A major project was the construction, again in raw wood, of a movie-lot-type facade of two houses on Sherbrooke St.

However, Corridart was labelled both "obscene" and "political". It was taken down after one week by city order. For Charney this action symbolized the cultural and political constraints under which artists and architects are forced to work. This point is emphasized in a videotape of the construction and destruction of the facades. The presence of police pushing away photographers is obvious.

The show also includes works which assemble photographs, news stories and Charney's ideas, to explore various concepts in architecture. Dictionnaire D'Architecture deals with the heroic and monumental in buildings and includes photos of bombed buildings in Hanoi and models for skyscrapers. This work and the other, Memo Series, which presents ideas for an air force war memorial, are somewhat less successful than the others. They present many thought-provoking ideas, sometimes with humorous touches. However, the super abundance of ideas prevents one from absorbing them on a more than superficial level.

Other Monuments 1970-77 closes April 30.

The U.C. Playhouse goes to hell; Woody Allen's God dies on stage

The most pleasing moment in the U.C. Playhouse production of God came near the end of the play, when Raymond Lefebvre walked on stage and died. I personally would go to see any play where Raymond was to walk on and die.

God ran six performances to standing room only crowds. Allen's comedy is popular, but difficult to perform well. I am sure those involved with U.C.'s God are now aware of the difficulties.

Joan Freeman, the director, had the nerve to re-write the script, supplying some local colour by changing characters and placenames. Ms Freeman should have been more concerned with her actors — the script has quite enough humour.

This loose resurrection of Greek theatre presents such heroes as Hepatitis, Diarrhea and Trichinosis. The cast parades before us in Greek tunics and long underwear (this combination could only work in a Woody Allen play). Allen lashes out at the Jewish American Princess image, exposing a seething lust and passion. Blanche Dubois (Streetcar Named Desire) visits the set in search of an order that eludes us all.

God broaches the play within play concept and toys with the linear consciousness of drama. Actors seated in the audience chat with us and create an intimate mood. We are left feeling very confused and the god who comes to earth does not solve any of the complications. While being lowered from the sky in a cushioned basket chair, God falls to her death. This was nicely treated by the production, but what is Woody Allen trying to say?

The script presents a good many challenges; more than Freeman was able to handle. Unfortunately her actors suffered from this and delivered tepid portrayals that were all a dead end. Jay Houpt was a nebbish slave and the only performer (out of 17 actors) that showed any sense of character. Oedipus was miscast. Janis Allen was unforgivable as Doris Levine from Forest Hill; a J.A.P. may be amorous, but she is always tasteful.

The song "good for God" was as effective as new blood is to a cadaver.

Ellen Kachuk, the choreographer, should seriously consider directing traffic. The chorus that cluttered the stage did nothing else but a few line kicks and some stylized gestures; while upstage a Rabbi, a Bishop, and the god were looking equally lost. The opportunity for some very strong visual statements was completely ignored.

Technically the production was a failure. Stephen Plotkin was having better luck as an usher. His lighting was without focus and relied on already tired clichés. Electricians have done better work lighting a gymnasium.

The bang-up ending of God was sloppy and out of control. I sympathize with those who sat near the stage as they were in danger of getting hurt. Creating the illusion of frenzy and chaos should not have involved the risk of injury to actors and audience alike.

While the production made me laugh, it left me with an uneasy smile and the chilling thought that perhaps it was to begin all over again.

Don't eat the red snow

Last week I made my way past a welcoming committee of Greenpeace placard holders to see They Club Seals. Don't they? in the Tarragon theatre.

Despite the humourless brutality in the title, the series of skits, presented by Newfoundland's Mummers troupe, does succeed in satirizing the rhetoric that drowns both sides of the issue, albeit not without contributing its own.

I must object to the fact that the play removes the spotlight from the fate of the seals and focuses on the seal hunt as a history of human interests and conflicts (although this aspect cannot be ignored). "Will the harp seal be around in ten years?" is a question the troupe treats in too cavalier a fashion to come off as convincing, a question they dismiss with so much ease it makes me uneasy. Understandably they may have shied away from joking about extinction. But when all eyeballs are pointed at the humans and the humour in the controversy one tends to forget the animals.

They club seals, don't they? transmits the point of view of the sealer and his family in a titillating

East Coast dialect. You can really taste the flavour of an entirely different culture; one has trouble faulting the acting. The crew burlesques admirably the ignorance and hypocrisy of the big city dwellers who, one imagines, sign anti-sealing petitions from within the confines of comfortable armchairs because someone told them to, people whose lifestyle and mentality are so different from the sealers' that their presence on the ice floes of Labrador would be ludicrous. They sing "You think I'll pay for your nonrenewable ways? No way!"

When the Mummers compare the actions of protesters to a circus forum it's funny. One of them does a replay of Brian Davies' balancing act on a chain. A male Brigitte Bardot struts onto centrestage, blows us all a kiss, cuddles a "baby" seal and stomps off stage shouting "Vive le bebe phoque libre!" Then two people dressed like clowns walk out and take a survey.

The audience are seals. The clowns get confused with the numbers they have tallied. It's a good sketch and it hammers a point down hard.

It's unfortunate the Mummers rely on the emotionalism tactic they make fun of. There are as many references to sobbing or upset wives whose husbands are away sealing and to the hardships inherent in the sealers' way of life as there are to "cute, cuddly seals". Once you can identify with the sealers on an emotional level there's a strong tendency to identify with the pro-sealing argument. There may be nothing wrong with this, but one must remember that emotions don't enter into the sealing debate.

The Mummers are talented actors and musicians. If their goal was to communicate a lifestyle they did a good job. But if their aim was to persuade anti-sealers over to their point of view then they certainly didn't persuade me.

Diary of Anne Frank: three's good company with the Wallachs

Yet another glowing review of The Diary of Anne Frank. It seems impossible not to add one's voice to the general pitch of enthusiasm which has greeted this latest venture at the Young Peoples' Theatre. Understandably, the major drawcard of this production has been the family acting ensemble of Eli Wallach, Anne Jackson and daughter Roberta Wallach, each of whom delivered satisfyingly first-class performances—by no means eclipsing, however, an excellent cast of Canadian supporting actors. Praise must be accorded to director Martin Fried, not only for his astute casting but also for his actors to exact the best from his actors.

The play, adapted from Anne Frank's diary by Frances Goodrich and Albert Hackett, begins on a late November day in 1945. Mr. Frank (Eli Wallach) climbs the stairs to the deserted top floor of an Amsterdam warehouse where from 1942-44 he and his family had hidden from the Nazis. As he wanders about the rooms, the painful memories flooding back, a former employee, (Miep (Mary Long) follows him upstairs. She hands over to Mr. Frank a bundle of papers (including the diary) which had been discovered in the attic shortly after the family's arrest. As Otto Frank begins to read the diary, the stage blackens and another voice—Anne's—takes over the narrative. We return to 1942 and the family's first day of residence in their hiding place. Anne's diary will provide a continuing link between the events we see onstage and the months often elapsing between them.

The Franks share their confined quarters with another family, the Van Daans, and - a few months later - a hypochondriac Jewish dentist named Dussel. For two years these eight people hide from the outside world in the few rooms which simultaneously represent their prison and their refuge. Two members of Otto Frank's staff, Miep and Mr. Kraler (August Schellenberg), supply them with food and other necessities.

Considering its subject, what is perhaps most striking about the play is the engaging warmth and humour which defines it. Much of the reason for this lies in the characterization. These people, with their exasperating faults, eccentricities and lovable qualities, are always believable. One comes to care about them and what lies ahead in the future; hence the audience's intense absorption in the final moments of the play. Kate Reid is wonderfully entertaining as the tactless, slightly vulgar Mrs. Van Daan, while Henry Ramer as her bad-tempered husband and Robert Joy as their sensitive adolescent son gave very solid performances. Paul Soles did ample justice to the fussy, middle-aged Mr. Dussel, while Katia De Pena was adequate in the comparatively colourless role of Anne's older sister, Margot.

A secondary thread which runs through the play concerns the tenuous relationship between the rebellious thirteen year old Anne and her mother. Anne Jackson gives a splendidly restrained performance as the sensitive, reserved Mrs. Frank, who is arbitrarily shut off from her youngest daughter's affection and confidence. "She wants nothing of me," Mrs. Frank sobs in one heart-rending scene. Eli Wallach as the adored father is the right combination of kindness and inner strength, managing to avoid the mawkish and sentimental dangers of this role.

It is to Roberta Wallach, however, that the evening's laurels belong. The role of Anne Frank is the most demanding of the characters. The course of the play spans her awkward pubescent years from thirteen to fifteen - an exacting task for any twenty-two year old actress. But Roberta Wallach is always convincing. She portrays Anne with the appropriate blend of the maddeningly selfish, boisterous young teenager as well as the sensitive, introspective and gifted person capable of writing the diary. Her shifts in mood from high-flown rebelliousness one moment to shaky self-evaluation the next, are convincingly handled: "I say too much. I go too far. I hurt other people's feelings," Anne sorrowfully repents after another blow-up.

The performance begins at 7.30. Tickets are at this state difficult to get, but worth the effort.

Dog Beneath the Skin: a highly political animal

Would that it were possible to begin and end a review with the succinct comment that 'you had to be there'. In the case of the Auden-Isherwood political satire, The Dog Beneath the Skin, once would not be enough. Even with aides-memoires, it remains thoroughly engrossing but not easily accessible, an opulent celebration, a fable with inexact correspondences.

The plot's premise is straight ahead. Alan Norman searches on the continent for a missing baronet, having been promised the hand of the missing person's sister if he succeeds. He is accompanied on his varied journeys to decadent Ostinia, totalitarian Westland, and divers dives between, by a large and unnamed Dog. Eventually returning to his village of Pressan Ambo, Alan finds that all is perfectly — or, sadly, imperfectly — clear.

There is richness in this production which infuriates the viewer who cannot locate the historical circumstances which are being discussed. The general correspondences are obvious enough; the particulars require more exhumation than can be practised in two hours at the play. Dog is a social historian's treasure, but it does not easily translate into active drama. Not that director Michael Sidnell did not try, or that he was not ably abetted.

The use of the Hart House stage is more creative than I have seen in several years, a constant variety of techniques and depths. A framing device provides a rostrum for didactic comments outside the satirical structure of Norman's quest. And the newly-composed music by Rod Taylor and Gordon Woodbury is well-performed, a delight in itself, and the glue that keeps the episodic spectacle intact when it creaks into historical amber.

The cast, obviously well-disciplined, worked like interchangeable acting units, highly successful in ensemble playing. The average level was most respectable. Particular moments stood out — touches, perhaps, of brilliance in choreography, direction, or humour — the two journalists' song-and-dance, the King of Ostnia's execution arrangements, a scene in a railway carriage, an operatic deathbed. I decline to name names and enumerate accomplishments, not because success was not achieved, but because evenness was obtained.

Dog lurks, a highly political animal, at Hart House for two more nights. A venture there would vastly increase your appreciation of theatre on campus.

End of the World

Suddenly Anders was aware of a distant pang sounding somewhere deep inside him. His manhood having swelled to cyclopean proportions, Anders could feel his tongue explore the beauty that was Brita. But this has little to do with The End Of The World, a John Hayes film now showing at the Imperial Six.

The plot is childishly simple. Seven aliens visit Earth; they do not like it; they destroy it. A rather rash decision when you consider that running back Terry Metcalf has just signed with the Toronto Argonauts. Still if you are an alien named Zindar and you have a head shaped like a bowling ball, football may not be your bag.

The film is almost saved by the special effects: for a mere $3.75 you can see a telephone, a 64 Dodge, a coffee machine, a furnace, and four men explode. That's not news, but that too is the reality of The End Of The World.

It may happen any day, so be prepared. Like many of the crueler aspects of this harsh world in which we live, you may decide that you do not want to see this film. Congratulations.

Anders reached for a Marlboro and gently sucked in the smoke. Next to him, the bed was still rumpled where minutes before Brita had lain. She had been good, but not that good.

Several notes from the underground to begin this week's watsup. First, duties in Ottawa are going to take me away from the theatre department here for the rest of the year, and watsup will be written by various staffers who get suckered into it. After four years here, The Varsity deserves a break.

Second, we've been hard-pressed for space for the last little while and our copy has backed up for more than a week at a time. Apologies to our faithful writers and the readers who have wondered whether we review only for our pleasure, not their edification. In particular, smaller campus shows have felt the crunch, and The Jew of Malta, recently performed at Vic, deserves at least a notice. The Marlowe play was produced on a tight budget — and the props showed it — and with a small cast. The enthusiasm made up for acting unevenness, and Blake Heathcote held down the role of Barabas with aplomb. Kudos is due to all concerned for a gutsy presentation of a rarely seen play; we have a review in the office should you want to see your names in print (almost).

Now, on to better things: at the Bayview Playhouse, 481-6191, Theatre Compact unveils a revived Arsenic and Old Lace, with an experienced cast directed by Eric House. Tuesdays to Sundays at 8:30; with 2:30 matinees Wednesday and Saturday. Cyclos Theatre, operating out of the Unlimited Space, 95 Danforth at Broadview, has a new show, Suddenly Open Windows, running Tuesday to Sunday at 8:30. Call 461-6551. At Bathurst St. Theatre, two new plays in town; in the Lennox St. half, Nephesh Theatre's Children of Night, which was panned by the critics, who were panned by the cast after last week's performance... 536-6663, Monday to Thursday at 8:30, Sunday at 2:00 and 7:30; Saturday at 8:00. Confusing? Around the corner, at New Theatre (the Bathurst St. entrance) Sexual Perversity in Chicago jams them in; reservations are in order, you can use a phony name if the title scares you off, call 534-1101. Tuesday to Sunday at 8:45; it's not cheap ($4.50-$5.50) but it's good.

It's a good week. At TWP, 12 Alexander Street, The Island is a strong condemnation of South Africa which avoids polemics to make its point; 925-8640 for pricing details and reservations, shows are Tuesday to Saturday at 8:30, with a Sunday matinee at 2:30. At Toronto Free Theatre, and running on the same performance schedule, The Brides of Dracula (downstairs) and, held over, The Spills (upstairs). 26 Berkeley St., or call 368-2856. The Diary of Anne Frank has been extended another eight shows (March 20-25) in response to an overwhelming demand for tickets; if you're interested, reserve now by calling 864-9732. Not much point in dropping by the Young People's Theatre, 165 Front St. E., but there may be returns...

Still running, The Splendour and Death of Joaquin Murietta at St. Paul's Centre, 121 Avenue Rd.; call 967-6584, 8:30 curtain each night this weekend. One performance this weekend, at Ryerson, of Der Hauptmann von Kopenick, imported from Montreal; call 924-3327 for details. Inscrutable silence from this corner. A debatable production of Brecht's Mother Courage and Her Children at the St. Lawrence; Monday to Saturday at 8:00, a Saturday matinee at 2:00, call 366-7723. At the Alex, The Whiz is doing quite alright, thank you. But some tickets may be available — call 363-4211.

A few recommendations? At Seeley Hall, Trinity, the TCDS presents a new play by John Ibbotson, First Taste, production values not guaranteed at the professional level — but so what? — and at Hart House, an interesting Dog Beneath the Skin which is extremely well backed-up by lobby displays. 8:00 and 8:30, respectively. Yes, we do go to campus theatre.

Hasta la vista.

Tonight: Now that the competition has dropped out the Revue has decided to compete. All week they're showing films which deserve to be shown, and yes this is still Toronto. They begin with a double bill of Rolando Klein's Chac and Victor Erice's The Spirit of the Beehive. It's running through the weekend and if you haven't seen either or both you shouldn't be seen anywhere else. Cinema Lumiere has returned from the grave to show Sunday, Bloody Sunday and Women In Love, which features a textbook example of heavy-handed symbolism at least once every three minutes. Ken Russell and D. H. Lawrence deserve one another. The Science Centre has Sutter's Gold. And the Good Old New Yorker which used to call itself the greatest theatre in the world is still showing Mohammed, Messenger of God.

Saturday: The U of T Film Society who become more surly and churlish by the week are presenting those two rare flowers in the garden of cinematic art Monty Python and the Holy Grail and Woody Allen's Watsup Tiger Lily?

Sunday: Cinema Archives, a.k.a. Regus Films, a.k.a. Innis has its usual plethora of cartoons in the afternoon and a mixed bag including H. G. Wells Things To Come at 7:30.

Monday: The Revue has two by Fassbinder Mother Kustern Goes To Heaven and Chinese Roulette. They'll run through Wednesday night. Lumiere has two Jack Nicholson imitations of life with Five Easy Pieces and The Last Detail.

Tuesday: The Science Centre continues to scrutinate the inscrutable with something called The Ascent.

Wednesday: The Science Centre has three short silent German films (though how you can tell when they're silent I can only guess) The Pride of the Firm, Shoe Salon Tinkus, and The Oyster Princess. OISE has a study in revisionist neo-realism with Rossellini's The Rise To Power of Louis XIV and De Sica's The Garden of Finzi-Contini.

Thursday: This won't be a good night to invite politicians to dinner parties. They'll all be having crises de conscience and/or coming down with acute cases of terminal angst as they attempt to decide which screen they should be staring at. The Revue has a naive Marxist look at peasant Stalinism with 1900 while the Science Centre is showing a revisionist Cominter production Julia Vyskaya, and for those most ideologically correct (and rational) there's the OISE bill of The Battle of Chile (Part I: Insurrection of the Bourgeoisie) which is concerned with the CIA financed preparations for the military coup which ended Salvador Allende's Popular Unity Government, and Reed Inurgent Mexico which is a fictionalised account of John Reed (Ten Days That Shook The World and the American Communist Party) and his involvement in the 1913 Mexican Revolution.

Soprano Janowitz has made a solid name for herself during the last decade by cutting a heap of DG albums with Karajan, Boehm, and Karl Richter. She appears tonight at the St. Lawrence Centre in a program of Schubert, Strauss, and Liszt. Some rush at 8:00.

Tomorrow night at the EJB, New Music Centre presents two "music-theatre" (not quite opera) premieres by R. Murray Schafer: "La Testa d'Aradne" and "Loving". Three bucks for students.

Sunday at three and Monday at eight, the Opera in Concert people are presenting Stiffello, the obscurest of all Verdi's efforts. There's no word on its musical value, but you may never hear it again. St. Lawrence Centre, $3.50 and $4.50 Sunday, $1.50 more Monday.

Two campus events Sunday: at 3:30 in the Conservatory Concert Hall Australian pianist Nigel Netthelm plays Mozart, Chopin, and Schubert. At eight in the Great Hall, the Hart House Chorus presents Pergolesi's Stabat Mater and Bruckner's E Minor Mass.

Tuesday evening at the St. Lawrence, violinist Winston Webber offers a very interesting recital of Busoni, Stravinsky, and Beethoven's "Kreutzer". Students a mere $2.

The free Thursday afternoon series in Walter Hall features a violin recital by Gwen Hoebig, a visitor from UBC. Program includes Mozart, Prokofiev and Eckhardt-Grammatte. Walter Hall at 2:10.

TSO principal oboist Harry Sargous joins bassoon popularizer George Zuckerman in the St. Lawrence Thursday at 8:30. Bach, Schumann, and Kodaly. $4 and $5.

Windy City sleaze

David Mamet's crisp pseudo-comedy Sexual Perversity in Chicago sold out on its first preview night. It will undoubtedly continue to sell out right to the end of its run, not due to yeours but to a well-acted, designed and paced production.

As the company's publicist is fond of observing, the play is about perversity and not about perversion. We are witnesses to the willfulness of two people who would destroy a love affair they themselves are incapable of creating. The romance which originally permeates the affair is slowly sandblasted down into raw sexual politics at the insistence of the lovers' erstwhile confidants. It is the souring of love which we observe in this eighty-minute play.

Mamet writes in a highly compressed vernacular style which sheds brilliance on sordid material. From the opening sketch — one man recounting to another his conquest of the night previous — it is clear that Mamet can cut through our layers of sweet reason and expose the detached carnality that lurks in most males. It isn't pretty, but it's primal; and the audience loved it for its concision.

Each of the performers was outstanding. The set on which they moved was very deco, the staging well-thought-out, with the exceptions of light cues which were not yet up to par and orange liquid masquerading as bourbon. No discernible flaws are to be found, though, in the pace; it is sprightly though it allows for fully developed gesture and speech.

The language of the play is blunt, the subject matter highly personal; but neither rings false. Puritanism might be misplaced at Sexual Perversity; the underlying message is not one of the sinfulness of carnality, but of the sinfulness which fails to involve the emotions in the flesh. The play, apparently brittle, can be quite deep. It would repay your attention — and it certainly will be gossip for the duration of its run.

The Varsity — Hugh Stuart

Hustle Not Enough For Hustlers

By HUGH STUART

The women's interfac A division championship hockey game was supposed to be a mismatch of the Leon Spinks-Muhammed Ali variety. Spinks won. And the Erindale Hustlers almost duplicated this feat as they lost a close 4-3 decision to the highly touted PHE squad.

The outcome of the game was in doubt from start to finish. Going into the third period, the score was tied 3-3. Phys Ed, seeing their championship hopes in peril, spent much of the game in the Erindale end. The Hustlers concentrated on fast breaks up the middle to forwards Mary Lou Hawkins and Mary Lou Borg but the Phys Ed defence, anchored by Patty Barclay, stymied the Hustlers time and time again.

Erindale goalie Cindy Isles, was the busiest player on the ice and her acrobatics constantly frustrated the PHE sharpshooters. While she had less to do, Phys Ed goalie Carol MacGougall was equally effective.

The final period featured the rough and emotional play that befits a championship game, and when the Erindale captain took a roughing penalty after a skirmish in front of the PHE net, it looked as if the game would be lost. However, the Erindale penalty killing unit, led by Borg proved to be as dangerous as the Phys Ed power play. Borg forced Isles to make two tough saves even though Phys Ed peppered the Erindale net for most of the power play.

Phys Ed's territorial advantage finally paid dividends when Sandy Turney netted the winner with a shot from the slot.

Turney ended up with two of the Phys Ed goals, while Barclay, and Anne Hoffman added singles. For Erindale, Hawkins netted a pair while Borg had a single. Darlene Knibbs assisted on two of the markers.

After the game, Bradley admitted that "they gave us a tougher game than we expected." True.

D'Alvise Gets Better As Season Goes On

By JIM O'LEARY

One of the oldest clichés in hockey says you can't win unless you have strength up the middle. A quick look at the Blues and you realize this saying has not become outdated.

The Blues have been paced all year by a solid core of centremen, led by all-star and league-leading scorer Doug Caines. Caines' fine work makes it easy to overlook the play of Frank Davis and, in particular, Dan D'Alvise.

D'Alvise has combined with Larry Hopkins and Cary Farelli to give the Blues as consistent a threesome as you will find anywhere. All three placed among the league's top five scorers.

In the playoffs they have played superbly, accounting for 16 of Toronto's 26 goals. In the Ontario final against Laurier last week, D'Alvise was particularly prominent, scoring the tying and winning goals in a 3-2 overtime win. The next night he came back to score the important opening goal to lead the Blues to a 4-1 win and the Queen's Cup.

D'Alvise attributes his line's recent success to the fact that "we finally came together as a unit. I'm usually a slow starter but this year I started slower than ever. I also had a different type of right winger. Last year I played with Alex Jeans who is more of a playmaker. Farelli is more of a shooter—as he should be because he has one of the best shots in the league."

Playing in the shadow of Doug Caines doesn't bother D'Alvise. He says, "I never think about it. Tommy (Watt) has no first or second line. Everyone is treated equal. I just go out and play my own game."

D'Alvise is in his second year with the Blues, having come to U of T from the Royal York Royals of the Provincial Junior A League. He showed enough in his final year with the Royals for the Maple Leafs to draft him.

"After my last year of junior I had three options," recalled D'Alvise. "I could either try out with the Leafs, continue my education or get a job. I toyed with the idea of coming to the U of T and made up my mind after I talked to Tommy. I liked the idea of being able to combine my education with playing hockey."

The six-foot, 190-pound centre, led the Blues in goals in his rookie season with 39. He also picked up 31 assists to make him the team's second leading scorer.

He continued his fine play this season and earned himself a spot on the Canadian Student National Team which competed in Czechoslovakia and Germany over the Christmas holidays.

He describes this nine-game tour as being "a super experience. I would like to do it again next year." (A student team is supposed to be sent to a tournament in Grenoble, France next December).

The European experience so impressed him that he is thinking of playing in Europe after he finishes in Toronto. "Maybe I'll play pro over there after I leave here," he said. "It would be a great experience to live there and learn a different language and different lifestyle."

What happens after he leaves the U of T is the least of D'Alvise's worries as he prepares for the national finals next weekend in Moncton, New Brunswick. D'Alvise has been through the pressure last year when the Blues took the national crown.

He anticipates there will be more pressure this year because the Blues enter the finals as the nation's number-one ranked team. Last year they were ranked only eighth.

"There will be more pressure this time. We're supposed to be the best. We have to make sure we are up for every game or someone could beat us," said D'Alvise.

He is confident, though, that the Blues will return to Toronto with their 10th national title since 1966.

"If everyone puts out the way they can, there is no reason why we shouldn't repeat as national champs," he says.

D'Alvise puts the tying goal behind the Laurier goalie last Friday.

Fac Ed Upset By Engineers

By JAMES McLEAN

At Varsity Arena Wednesday night, Jr. Engineering pulled a major playoff upset by defeating first place Faculty of Education 4-3. The Engineers earned the win by outplaying and outthrusting Fac Ed throughout the important latter part of the game.

During the first period it appeared as though Fac Ed would runaway with the game after demonstrating some smooth stickhandling and offensive play. It wasn't until both teams were short that Fac Ed's Kalio, backhanded a shot in the net to give his team the go ahead goal at the 11:00 minute mark.

The period progressed with two penalties allotted, but Engineers couldn't seem to get things together as a result of their errant passing and lacklustre checking. But with some luck they managed to dribble a goal past Fac Ed after a shot from the point by B. Laughton.

Early in the second period, Fac Ed had a chance to take the lead on a breakaway by Graves. Engineers goalie S. Hibbons, managed to force his backhand shot wide.

But it wasn't more than fifteen seconds later that Education's Kalio banged in his second goal during the chaos of a goal mouth scramble.

This seemed to be the edge Fac Ed needed as they came on strong with a fine three-man combination drop pass and goal. Wilkie of Education appeared to have provided his squad with the necessary margin to retain their solid lead by going into a "defensive shell".

This strategy proved fatal for education beginning with a penalty shot during the dying minutes of the second period. Engineer's M. Roy was the hero of the day as he neatly tucked his shot in behind the Education goaltender to put his team back in the game.

The third period continued quite uneventfully although Engineers appeared to turn the tables by becoming the aggressors.

It wasn't until 3:05 of the final period that Engineers R. Chorkawy slapped in a well deserved goal assisted by D. Fehr.

This was good cause for Education to worry. It appeared they couldn't handle the strain of this strong Engineering comeback. All their efforts lacked the dazzle which was so apparent in the first period. They could not complete a play in the Engineers zone.

Engineers, had the momentum and S. Howard shot a perfect pass into the upper left corner to give his team the lead and ultimate victory.

Although Education was first in the interfac standings over the year, they were convincingly beaten on the ice this night. Engineers, although not as talented individually, demonstrated a genuine desire to win.

SMC, Scarborough Impress In Playoff Openers

All the favourites advanced to the next round in Division One interfaculty basketball playoffs. St. Mike's (A) will meet Scarborough (I) in one match up while Sr. Engineering and Knox will meet in the other game.

Andy Bais led St. Mike's with 34 points as they powered their way past Erindale, 109-74, on Tuesday. St. Mike's ended the season tied for first in their division with an 11-3 record, while Erindale finished third with a 10-4 mark.

Other high scorers for SMC were John Nicol with 20 and Brent Hubbard with 19 points. High man for Erindale was Dave Bradshaw with 27 points.

Scarborough came on strong in the second half to take a 75-59 decision over Phys Ed (A) in a game played Monday night. At the half, the game was tied at 34.

Scarborough was led by Peter Dallos and Don Campbell who picked up 15 and 14 points respectively.

G. Górzynski scored 20 points to lead Sr. Engineering to an 86-67 victory over Dents A in a game played Tuesday night. Jim Chase responded with 25 points for Dents.

Knox, who had the best record in the league, had trouble with fifth place finishing New (I), but prevailed to win 50-43.

In Division Two, Scarborough (B) will meet Devonshire in the next round.

Paul Page scored 11 points as Scarborough downed Phys Ed (C) 68-31. Devonshire controlled their game from the outset to take a lopsided 62-33 win from Meds B.

Positions To Be Filled On Athletic Council

When the women's and men's athletic departments amalgamated last year, one of the most appealing aspects from a student's point of view was the opportunity to participate in making decisions. Under the new setup, an Athletic Council was formed, consisting of 24 members (12 of whom are students) who were entrusted with the responsibility of making decisions for the new Department of Athletics.

Nominations for positions of next year's council have been reopened in a number of constituencies where there have been no candidates so far. At present there are openings for four females and three males.

Females are needed in the following constituencies: 1) Woodsworth 2) Erindale 3) Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering 4) One candidate from the combined riding of Rehabilitation Medicine, Forestry, Landscape Architecture, School of Architecture, Pharmacy and Nursing.

Males are needed in the following constituencies: 1) Faculties of Dentistry and Medicine 2) New, Innis and Wycliffe Colleges 3) Law, Music, Management Studies, Library Science and Social Work.

The deadline for nominations is Friday March 17. Nomination forms are available at the Benson Building (Room 102), Hart House (Room 101) and Erindale College (South Building, room 114).

At least one Phys Ed player was disgusted by the whole affair in a game they lost to Vic last Tuesday.

Erindale gets tested

By RICHARD SMALL

English proficiency testing and Erindale's New New Program moved a step closer to final approval and implementation last Thursday when the Academic Affairs Committee of Governing Council voted in favor of both proposals.

The New New Program provisions, passed recently by the General Committee of the Faculty of Arts and Science, were approved unanimously after some debate.

Under the New New proposal, beginning in the fall of 1980 all students entering Erindale will be required to complete at least one humanities, one natural science and one social science course to be eligible for a bachelor's degree. A three-year degree student will have to complete the requirements for a minor concentration in a discipline while a four-year degree student will have to finish two minor concentrations or one specialization to gain a degree.

Erindale vice-principal Desmond Morton noted that the reaction of high school students and their teachers to this proposed policy has been favorable.

"We find that once the details have been explained to students they find that this is no different" from other universities, he observed.

"We find that once the details have been explained to students they find that this is no different" from other universities, he observed.

Morton claimed that U of T's Faculty of Arts and Science is the only faculty in North America without some kind of core program requirement. "We want to build our own reputation... we don't want to be the back door to the St. George Campus," he said.

Morton also noted that Erindale is considering making obligatory interviews for students with faculty advisors to ensure that the available counselling is used.

English proficiency tests were approved over the protests of most of the student representatives on the committee. The tests would be given at admission time starting in the fall of 1980. Students failing the test would have one year in which to prepare for the next test, a requirement for the continuation of their university studies.

Student rep Julia Turner charged that testing would put visa students at "a distinct disadvantage." Arts and Science dean Arthur Kruger dismissed objections to the proposal, saying "we're talking about tests that students used to pass at Grades 7 and 8."

Student governor Michael Treacy then announced that he would introduce a motion at Academic Affairs' next meeting forcing professors and TA's to take English tests as well. He cited personal experience with faculty who "couldn't communicate" and said that the regulations if applied only to students would not go "far enough."

In other business, the committee unanimously endorsed a motion to proceed with the final drafting of a contract that would see the Toronto School of Theology (TST) gain affiliate status with U of T. The TST comprises two independent colleges — St. Augustine's Seminary and Regis College — as well as departments in five colleges on the St. George campus — Emmanuel, Knox, St. Michael's, Trinity, and Wycliffe.

Academic Affairs also agreed to limit the number of places in the Faculty of Dentistry available to foreign students.

By HEATHER HILL

A decision to occupy U of T president John Evans' office in protest against the "devastating effects (of) cutbacks" was put into effect at 8:45 a.m. today.

A group of 12 U of T students and faculty members, who are calling for support of the anti-cutbacks demonstration at Queen's Park March 16, entered Simcoe Hall this morning with a list of six demands for Evans and Governing Council.

The 12 occupiers, who say they are acting in support of the U of T Cutbacks Coalition, arrived equipped with sleeping bags, food hampers, flashlights, a transistor radio and a 40-foot extensible ladder.

According to group spokesperson John Doherty, an Erindale College student and the External Commissioner for the Students' Administrative Council (SAC), the occupiers are prepared to stay until they feel their demands have been met satisfactorily.

The occupiers' demands are:

- that all classes, labs and tutorials the afternoon of March 16 be re-scheduled, that U of T staff be given the time off to go to the rally and that Evans and president-elect James Ham join in the rally "as a method of demonstrating the university's stand against cutbacks.

- that Evans make a public statement against cutbacks and the current government policy towards post-secondary education.

- that Governing Council adopt an open and democratic budgeting process.

- that Governing Council halt all cutbacks in academic programs, services, academic and support staff and library maintenance.

- that Governing Council demand of the provincial government that the student aid program eliminate all grant eligibility periods and provide full grant support for students whose parents earn less than $10,000 annually.

- that Governing Council institute a five-year freeze on tuition fees and the differential fee for foreign students be removed.

At a two-hour meeting yesterday afternoon, the students and faculty participating in the occupation, along with other supporters, agreed to "blitz" the university campus with a variety of pamphlets to make the U of T community aware of the "grim 'new reality'" in education facing them.

Supporters will also be distributing a "calling card" to students. Printed by the Ontario

Federation of Students for province-wide distribution, the little white card informs the recipient he/she has "an appointment with Harry Parrott, D.D.S., at Queen's Park, Toronto on Thursday, March 16 at 2:00 p.m."

"Failure to keep this appointment," the card reads, "may result in forfeiting our colleges and universities."

Occupation organizers also had planned for supporters to walk through classrooms and offices today to distribute the literature and inform them of the March 16 rally.

Occupiers include Dan Goldstick, an associate professor of philosophy, Harvey Cooper, an undergraduate student and the president of the Political Economy Course Union, Chris Rogers, a graduate student representative on Governing Council, Kate Bishop, a SAC representative for Innis College and Elliot Rose, a History professor.

Doherty described the occupation, which follows in the wake of take-overs at Trent, McMaster and Carleton Universities, as "a symbolic gesture to draw attention to the (March 16) rally and to the need for all students, faculty and staff to participate in the demonstration."

Over 1000 march for women

By PETER HOHENADEL

More than 1,000 women and men marched in the streets of Toronto Saturday afternoon to celebrate International Women's Day.

The women's march, the largest of its kind ever seen in Toronto, moved under police escort from U of T to Toronto City Hall, by way of Bloor and Yonge Streets. Similar demonstrations also took place in Vancouver, Edmonton, Winnipeg, and Montreal on the same day.

Before the march began, Women's Day supporters met at U of T's Convocation Hall to listen to speakers who outlined the current issues and history of women's rights.

Carolyn Eagan, speaking for the International Women's Day Committee, the coalition of women's groups that organized the celebration, demanded that women be given control of their bodies. Supporters applauded enthusiastically Eagan's call for safe contraception, abortion on demand, and quality day care.

Eagan also spoke about broader social issues affecting women. "We all need the right to work and the right to a living wage," she said. Eagan called for an end to wage controls and protested against the Ontario Housing Corporation's discrimination against lesbians.

Eagan concluded, "We demand an end to police harassment of prostitutes, body rub attendants, and topless waitresses."

Heather MacNeill, an organizer for the Union of Bank Workers in British Columbia, told the audience about the struggle to organize female bank workers in that province. She said the bank workers' union movement started eight years ago when a single branch appealed to the Labor Relations Board for the right to unionization. MacNeill related that the union is now prepared to request that all B.C. bank workers become members.

MacNeill held up the victory as an example for the women of Ontario in the banks and offices of this province.

The balloons, buttons and placards dotting Convocation Hall were funded by donations and events organized by the International Women's Day Committee.

Shirley Douglas, daughter of former federal NDP leader Tommy Douglas, a sometime actress and a civil rights activist in the United States for the past 15 years, appealed to the crowd for donations.

"We look forward to the day when the Air Force wants to buy another bomber and we can say to them: Go and have a bake sale," she said.

About one-fifth of the demonstrators were men. Representatives from trade unions, as well as women from the NDP, York University and various gay rights groups carried banners in the march. During the march, the Women's Day supporters briefly closed ranks with demonstrators protesting the Newfoundland seal hunt.

1000 men and women turned out Saturday for women's rally.

Staff Meeting Tuesday at 2pm

Scarboro pres.elected

By NICK MAROTTA

Scarborough College Student Council (SCSC), will next year demonstrate a positive outlook in its business dealings, according to next year's president, Sheldon Leith.

In a 28 per cent voter turnout last Thursday, Sheldon Leith eked out a 35-vote victory over Pat Pitters. In a similarly close race for vice-president Randy Magnus, a third-year commerce student, won by 20 votes over Alex Waithe, this year's Cultural Affairs Minister.

The platform that won the presidency centered around the continuation of a sound financial policy. Leith had proposed various means to augment SCSC income. He suggested use of the college's games room profit to provide for increased services where needed. Leith also wanted to secure the Wintario organization's financial assistance for the staging of cultural banquets and dances. He said the college could derive further profit this way.

Leith also promised to devote his attention to student unemployment. He said he believes the SCSC should secure the college's active participation in aiding the students in their search for employment.

OK to miss classes on March 16

By KATHY CANTY

U of T will not be closed for the March 16 demonstration against cutbacks, but staff and students should not be penalized for attending the rally, according to a memo sent by Vice-President and Provost Donald Chant to all principals, deans and directors.

Chant also stated that no tests or examinations should be scheduled for that day. "The decision, of course, rests with you," said Chant. In view of the damage budget reductions will do to the quality of education, and the bleak possibility of staff salary increases, however, the administration should take a "sympathetic and co-operative stance," he added.

The U of T Coalition Against Cutbacks sent a letter to President John Evans Mar. 3 asking that the university be closed the afternoon of the demonstration. But they never received a reply, according to student council president John Tuzyk.

York, Carleton and Trent Universities will be closed March 16 and the coalition is disappointed that U of T didn't follow the example of these universities, he added. "The logic of the memo ignores the fact that for many students missing a class on Thursday would be a real penalty," said Tuzyk.

Tuzyk also felt that different staff may be "treated unequally depending on how their supervisors feel."

Graduate assistants accept administration's contract offer

By SHANE PARKHILL

Six months of negotiations finally came to an end last Thursday when members of the Graduate Assistants Association (GAA) voted 125 to 7 in favor of accepting the university administration's latest contract offer. Although the GAA did not win all of its demands, GAA business agent Jean Greatbatch called it a "definite improvement over our last contract."

The contract includes a 6.2 per cent pay increase for the present teaching year retroactive to September and a 3.75 per cent increase for next year. Greatbatch maintained that the administration's refusal to make the first increase retroactive caused negotiations to break down Jan. 12, when the GAA applied to the Ontario Government for the appointment of a conciliator.

The GAA also gained the establishment of a system whereby all bargaining unit members automatically become members of the union and have union dues deducted from their pay for the first month of their appointment. Thereafter, they may opt out of dues and membership to the GAA by signing a dues revocation form.

According to Greatbatch, this point, plus the agreement of the administration to give the GAA the addresses of all graduate teaching assistants, will mean a substantially higher GAA membership than in the past. (Until the contract, only about half of the university's 2,029 graduate assistants were members of the GAA.)

The contract also provides for the establishment of a labor-management committee to deal with matters affecting GAA members not covered in the contract, the right of individual GAA members to be represented by his or her union steward at disciplinary meetings and the right of graduate assistants to grieve job performance evaluations on the basis of discrimination.

The GAA also received a few letters of intent (public statements which are not contractually binding) from the administration. One of these reaffirmed that GAA members will not be laid off disproportionately in the event of cutbacks. Another letter promises that if supplementary wage increases are granted to university staff or faculty during 1978-79, consideration will be given for making similar adjustments to the GAA contract.

Demands which the GAA did not win include a reduction in tutorial size and a reclassification of wage scales on the basis of the jobs themselves rather than the level of certified education of the graduate assistant performing them.

Greatbatch also complained that the salary increases GAA members and other university staff are receiving are less than the 8 per cent for this year and 5.8 per cent for next year that the Government is allocating the university for the payment of salaries.

Batten joins race

By ALAN STEWART

Today the Varsity interviews the last of the candidates for the student seats on Governing Council. Bev Batten is running for one of the two part-time undergraduate seats (Constituency I) on Governing Council.

"The whole tone of the Macdonald report is condescending to students," says Bev Batten, a Woodsworth college student.

Batten, currently Office Assistant for the Association of Part-Time Undergraduates (APUS), says the report is the main issue facing Governing Council at this time. "The report curtails student involvement in the policy-making process incredibly." Batten is particularly opposed to the proposal to merge the committees of Academic Affairs and Planning and Priorities, a move that she says will cause the student voice on the new committee to be drowned out by the sizable faculty representation.

Batten feels that the Macdonald report has too much potential support to be defeated outright, but she hopes that Governing Council will amend its proposals to remove the most objectionable features.

Batten also opposes mandatory

English proficiency testing and the New New Program at Erindale. She hopes students will realize that the movement for increased academic constraints on students is closely connected to the financial cutbacks currently being imposed on them.

Batten warns that cutbacks in the university will particularly threaten courses in newer disciplines such as Women's Studies and the Innis College interdisciplinary program. "What I'm afraid of is that with all the cutbacks, anything that is innovative will be the first to go, and we'll go back to a very conservative, basics-oriented outlook," she said. "I think that's very dangerous."

Governing Council should examine methods of deficit financing that would allow the effect of cutbacks to be moderated, according to Batten.

She believes that the Campus as Centre Project should be regarded as an essential for the university, not as a luxury item. "Discussion between students is part of their education," she said.

Batten believes that her dual role as part-time student and worker for APUS will especially qualify her to represent the views of part-time students on Governing Council.

Ontario profs back Thurs demo

By JIM TRAWN

The Ontario Confederation of University Faculty Associations (OCUFA) has joined the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) in endorsing the March 16 anti-cutbacks demonstration at Queen's Park.

The endorsement came Saturday at a meeting of the OCUFA executive, according to the York representative on the Metro Coalition Against Cutbacks, Prof. Lee Lorch. Prof. Harvey Dick of the University of Toronto Faculty Association (UTFA) will address the rally on behalf of OCUFA.

Elsewhere around the province, the Senate of Carleton University in an emergency meeting has decided to cancel classes on the day of the demonstration. This was the response to one of the demands of students who began an occupation of the acting president's office on Thursday.

An OFS spokesman told The Varsity that a minimum of 20 out of town buses were expected for the rally, in addition to the 20 buses from York and those coming from Ryerson on foot. Particularly heavy turnouts are expected from McMaster, Trent (where classes were also cancelled as a result of an occupation), Carleton and Guelph, according to OFS.

The spokesmen also added that local rallies are being planned for Sauli College, Laurentian University, the regional provincial government building in Thunder Bay and Lakehead University.

Davis and your future

Feeling depressed? Got that old "no future" feeling? Suspect that university just might not be worth it?

Come to see the man with the answers. Ontario's premier, Bill Davis, will be on the U of T campus, as the Honorary Visitor in a Hart House debate.

Davis, who will be speaking on the resolution, "that the future of Confederation depends on Ontario," will also be prepared, we are sure, to speak on the future of Ontario, and of Ontario universities. Find out what your future is. Let's ask Bill. He knows.

Post-secondary education is in a crisis. Provincial funding is not keeping pace with inflation. The allocation for funding to universities for next year will result in increase in class sizes, reduction in library services and forced use of obsolete equipment.

Inadequate STUDENT AID

Under the new plan, students will only be eligible for student aid during their first four years of post-secondary education. Parental contributions will start for families earning $6,600. It would have been $7,600 if OSAP had continued for next year. At least 15,000 students will be cut off from grants.

Threatened UNEMPLOYMENT

How long will you have to wait to get a job? One quarter of last year's graduates were still looking for work six months after completing school. Last summer 25% of students were unemployed. This summer is expected to be worse.

You can eat grapes

On January 31, 1978, the president of the United Farm Workers, Cesar Chavez, announced the end of the union's boycott of non-UFW California table grapes and head lettuce and of Gallo wines. The boycott, said Chavez, was no longer necessary because of the operation of the 1975 Agricultural Labor Relations Act. That law, the only one of its kind outside Hawaii, guarantees California farm workers the right to choose union representation in secret ballot elections, and after government certification, to bargain collectively with their employers. Since the passage of the ALRA, and despite many problems with its administration, the UFW has negotiated 88 contracts and won certification in 117 other elections (negotiations are in progress); 43 additional election victories await certification.

The immediate origins of the boycott date back to 1965 when the United Farm Workers, joined striking Filipino grape pickers in the area around Delano, California and organized a boycott of Delano grapes. By 1968 the boycott had been extended to cover all California table grapes and had become international in scope.

In Toronto the boycott was spearheaded by labour and community groups which worked in conjunction with the U. of T. Support Committee, a group of concerned students and faculty. As a result of these efforts, many contracts were won in the next few years despite actions to aid the grape growers taken by groups such as the U.S. Defence Department, which bought, in fiscal year 1969, 2.7 million more pounds of grapes than they had during the previous year. By 1970, over 80 per cent of the California table grape industry had signed with the UFW.

As grape growers were coming to terms with the United Farm Workers, lettuce growers, frightened by the success of the grape boycott, were signing "sweetheart" contracts with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters — one of the largest, wealthiest, and, in the view of many, most corrupt unions in the world. When these growers broke up a Salinas lettuce strike through the use of rural court injunctions in 1970, the UFW began a boycott of head lettuce.

The next few years saw the union fighting off a concerted attack by agribusiness and its allies among the Teamsters, state governments, and the Nixon Administration, but nevertheless suffering heavy losses. Most of the grape growers whose UFW contracts expired in 1973 refused to renew them or to hold new elections on union representation, choosing to sign instead with the Teamsters. In the massive grape strikes which ensued, two UFW members were killed, hundreds of members and supporters injured by Teamster goons and local police, and thousands arrested for violating restrictive court injunctions.

It was then that the union renewed the international boycott of grapes. Also boycotted were Gallo wines, the producers of which had suddenly switched to the Teamsters after six years under UFW contract. The boycott of lettuce, grapes and wine, together with renewed strikes, was to a large extent responsible for the successful enactment of the Agricultural Labor Relations Act in 1975.

If the beginnings of the farm workers' boycott can be traced back to 1965, its roots lie much deeper — in the conditions which have been produced alongside the bounty of fruits, vegetables, and profits.

The average year-round farm worker, who works the equivalent of 306 days of farm wage labor, earns about $14.00 per day, while the daily pay of the average migrant seasonal worker is $9.00 for women and $10.00 for men. Because of the poverty of their families, and despite child labor laws, many children are forced to work in the fields; about one-fourth of all American farm workers are under the age of sixteen.

Most farm workers can get no medical insurance and have difficulty finding and affording medical care. Few growers make provisions for such care for their workers although, with an accident rate three times that of non-agricultural work, farm labor is the third most dangerous occupation in the U.S. California farm workers have an occupational disease rate twice that of all other industries in the state combined. Most farm worker families in California live in substandard housing usually supplied, often at exorbitant rents, by growers; farm workers are at least twice as likely as the general population to die of influenza, pneumonia, and tuberculosis, and their infant and maternal mortality rates are 125 per cent above the national average. This, no doubt, helps account for the fact that the life expectancy of the average migrant worker is 49 years (39 in the state of Washington.)

It is conditions such as these, and the agricultural system which produces them, that the United Farm Workers have been trying to change. UFW contracts typically contain provisions not only for better wages but for health, welfare, and pension benefits, as well as pesticide safeguards. Equally important is the adjustment in the structure of power which they effect; union-run hiring halls replace the old labor contractor system, thus guarding against discrimination and other unfair hiring practices, and grievance procedures protect workers from the whims and prejudices of crew bosses (as well as, of course, from anti-union employers.) Moreover, democratically elected ranch committees of workers negotiate and deal directly with the growers and their representatives.

The union itself provides medical and life insurance, low-cost health clinics, a credit union and as well as, among other things, counseling and a newspaper. It also encourages political participation and exerts political pressure on authorities to enforce protective laws (including the Agricultural Labor Relations Act). It is for this that the union struggles.

Women's Commission on Friday, March 3rd, and our fall discussions on Rape, Women and the Law, Human Sexuality and Women's Studies. These were not formal Commission meetings, but were discussions geared towards fulfilling the needs of women on campus. At some of these meetings, the presence of men was objected to by certain women in attendance. We do not have an official policy in regard to male attendance at these discussions, but there has been a general consensus that the question would be dealt with at each individual session if the nature of the subject to be discussed seemed to warrant it.

In the case of the Rape discussion, External Commissioner John Doherty was present for the formal Women's Commission meeting before the discussion to talk about a NUS conference which we were sending a representative to. He had no intent of staying for the discussion, and left after the official Commission meeting. A member had expressed concern at his presence, but had thought he was intending to stay for the Rape discussion. On Friday, when this issue was raised again, it was explained that we had invited "all interested women" to the meeting, as we wished to discuss women's needs on campus, and how the Commission could fulfill those needs. All of those present then voted on whether we should continue the discussion with those people who were present, which included four male SAC directors, two of whom are members of the Women's Commission, and a majority of women. The motion carried, and we continued the meeting, with the men remaining in attendance.

Parrott memorial

It seems that all politicians are remembered by a slogan. John I. Macdonald said "A British subject I was born, a British subject I shall die." Wilfred Laurier said "The twentieth century belongs to Canada." Richard Nixon said "I am not a crook." Let us remember Harry Parrott for his student aid plan, "so that government by the Tories, for the interests, against the students, shall not perish from the earth."

Garbage journalism

After reading the totally biased piece of garbage written by a Mr. Hugh Stuart concerning the recent 1-0 loss by Phe to Vic in a sudden death playoff match, I felt compelled to write this letter and offer the truth of the matter. Mr. Stuart obviously has never competed in anything more emotionally and physically stimulating than tiddy-winks, and he undoubtedly has made his judgment of all Phe teams long ago. What happened in that Tuesday afternoon contest was one of the most blatant misuses of officiating, and you had to be playing in that game to really understand how totally deflating, frustrating and down-right disillusioned our club became as a result of one stupid call by a completely incompetent referee.

What had been progressing beautifully up until the four minute mark of the third period was a perfect scoreless game, with both teams equally displaying good, hard, clean hitting, fast end-to-end skating, and top notch goal-tending. Then, with four minutes remaining, in a game which the other referee had clearly and justifiably decided should be decided by the players and not a referee, the other "official" called a stupid penalty for, of all the obscene and dirty things, a "holding" infraction.

At this point, the other ref was clearly shocked by his partner's call, and he himself was more in a position to call the play than anyone.

What resulted was a ten-minute misconduct called on one of our players, for merely asking why the ref had called such a stupid penalty and then banging his stick on the ice in frustration.

After this second idiotic call, I don't care who you are, it's really damn difficult to control your emotions, especially when the whole season has come down to one game, which had to be ruined by one brainless official.

I disagree with your Mr. Stuart; Phys. Ed. didn't spoil a beautiful game, an incompetent and totally biased official did. Before the game ever began we had been hearing how this one particular ref was going to be "watching those Phe guys." Tell me this is a neutral official, eh Stuart? At any rate, the frustration is still there, but our team has resigned itself to the fact that our season is over and there isn't a thing we can now do about it. A protest was filed, and an investigation called, but what can they do? The fact remains — the game was a classic, going great, and with that much time remaining any intelligent official will tell you that you let the players decide the game, not the referees!

In conclusion, I ask your Mr. Stuart to henceforth write his trash stories without bias, if he can, and try to put himself in the victim's place, not the victor's.

The Kronstadt revolt

The Trotskyist League's letter (Varsity, 8 Mar.) contains all the usual slanders and outright lies that we have come to expect from the heirs of the butcher of Kronstadt and Gulyai-Polye. All of their allegations can be refuted with fact, facts that the Trotskyists are unable to deny.

Contrary to the lies of the Trotskyists the leaders of the Kronstadt revolt were essentially the same as those who led the 1917 revolt.

A comparison of the make-up of the Kronstadt Provisional Revolutionary Committees of 1917 and 1921 show them to be virtually identical. This blatantly contradicts the Trotskyist version of the Kronstadt events, which seeks to attribute the leadership of the revolt to elements recently joining the Navy and having nothing in common with the heroic sailors of 1917-1919.

Secondly, the Kronstadt sailors were not motivated by "a desire to get privileged ratings" as the Trotskyists state. The aims and motivations of the Kronstadt sailors are clearly shown in their stated programme which reads in part:

1. Immediate new elections to the Soviets.
2. Freedom of speech and of press for workers and peasants, and for anarchists, and for Left Socialists.
3. The right of assembly, and freedom for trade union and peasant organizations.
4. The liberation of all political prisoners of the Socialist parties.
5. The election of a commission to look into the dossiers of all those detained in prisons and concentration camps.
6. The abolition of all political sections in the armed forces. No political party should have privileges for the propagation of its ideas or receive State subsidies to this end.
7. The equalization of rations for all workers.
8. The granting to the peasants of freedom of action on their own land, and of the right to own cattle, provided they look after them themselves and do not employ hired labour.

The actual reason for the revolt was the sailors support for strikers in Petrograd who were demanding that the Bolsheviks re-establish the local markets, closed by Petrograd Commissar Zinoviev, an action that had pushed the already desperate population to the brink of mass starvation. Confronted with the misery of the Russian workers who were seeking an outlet to their intolerable conditions, the servile Party Committee and Zinoviev could find no better persuasion than brute force. On February 24 a state of siege was proclaimed and the leaders of the strikes were arrested. The Kronstadt sailors took an interest in the situation and sent a delegation to investigate the source of the strikes. When they returned and gave their reports the above-mentioned programme was drafted and voted upon.

The Bolsheviks instantly condemned the program as the product of a White conspiracy. A delegation sent from Kronstadt to negotiate with the Bolsheviks was arrested and later shot; so much for the Trotskyist claim that the Bolsheviks tried to negotiate. Instead they prepared a massive assault, bringing in troops from remote regions who had not been affected by the "Kronstadt spirit." Delegates to the Tenth Party Congress were also enlisted under the direction of Leon Trotsky. The assault was preceded by a pitiless two-day artillery barrage supplemented by aerial attacks culminating in a massive infantry assault across the ice and the slaughter of what had been described in happier days as "the pride and glory of the revolution."

The suppression of Kronstadt was an act of outright counter-revolution, the throttling of the popular movement at a time when Lenin and Trotsky, not Stalin, stood at the helm of the Soviet regime. The fact that the fall of Kronstadt and the slaughter of the rebels coincided with the fiftieth anniversary of the butchering of the Paris Commune (with Trotsky and Zinoviev dutifully denouncing Thiers and Gallifet) added a note of sick irony to this tragic betrayal of the revolution.

The Trotskyist's slander of Makhno can be disposed of even easier than their defamation of Kronstadt. Far from being a movement of "strong, well fed peasants with something to lose" or "kulak fiefdom" as the Trotskyists have elsewhere styled it, the Makhnovist movement could be no stretch of the imagination be called a kulak movement. Koubanin, the official Bolshevik historian of the Makhno movement, shows statistically, in a book edited by the Party's Historical Institute, that the Makhno movement first appeared and developed most rapidly in precisely those areas where the peasants were poorest. Trotsky had a congenial hatred for the poor peasantry of the Ukraine, being himself a kulak the son of a rich kulak as he admits in his autobiography "My Life". The Makhnovichna more than once bailed out Trotsky's blundering Red Army, demoralized to the point of chaos by the imposition of secret police discipline and riddled by an utterly unscrupulous, self-serving ex-Tsarist officer corp many of whom had been personally recruited by Trotsky. At Tula it was Makhno's severing of Denikens supply lines that enabled the Bolsheviks to turn him back. Their reward was to have their third agreement made with the Bolsheviks treacherously broken, to see their leaders murdered by the Chka and themselves branded as bandits and hunted down like animals.

The brutal suppressions of Kronstadt and the Makhnovichna graphically illustrate the degeneration of the Russian Revolution under Lenin and Trotsky. Trotsky was to reap the bitter harvest of Kronstadt when he found himself totally unable to mobilize worker support for his challenge to Stalin and the Party bureaucracy Trotsky had helped to create.

If the rationale for Stalinist or Trotskyist attacks on Kronstadt is that it was "an essential action against the class enemy", or as more "sophisticated" revolutionaries style it "a tragic necessity" one is entitled to remind them of Marx's dictum that "the emancipation of the working class is the task of the working class itself". Do they take this seriously or do they merely pay lip service to the words? Do they identify socialism with autonomy (organizational and ideological) of the working class? Or do they see themselves, with their judgments as to what should be "permitted", as the leadership around which the future elite will crystallize and develop? One is entitled not only to ask... but also to suggest the answer.

Red: "But comrade, don't you see that without the Party, the revolution is like a knife without a blade?"

Black: "And in power, the Party is like a blade without a handle!"

SAC needs "Yes"

We the undersigned are writing to urge all full time undergraduates to vote "Yes" in the SAC Fees

Referendum being held concurrently with the SAC Elections this Wednesday and Thursday.

The current SAC fee of $12 is the same as it was in 1968 and is presently the lowest fee of any student council in Ontario. For the last two years, AC has not raised its fee but rather has absorbed the cost of inflation and new projects through depletion of its reserves.

SAC needs sufficient resources to do the job we as students demand of it. Without an increase in the SAC fee to be effective September 1979 SAC would not be able to function as an effective vehicle for serving and representing our interests as U of T students.

A "Yes" vote will allow SAC to maintain its current level of activity and services. More importantly, it will allow our university student council to effectively meet the challenge of new student concerns and demands as they arise in the future.

Varg dashes hopes

It was with the greatest dismay and consternation that I saw in last Monday's Varsity a picture of a fellow Whitney resident and myself, with a caption alleging that she "was not aware" of a recent meeting of the SAC Women's Commission and that I "knew but didn't care". I object vehemently to the misrepresentation, since I was inspired to pose for the picture solely by the innocent desire to "hit the big time" and see my name in print in our eminent university paper. And now to see my hopes for future success in public office cruelly dashed by a single misquote!

Let it be known that, although I admitted awareness of the existence of the Women's Commission, I did not know of this particular meeting. I crave pardon of the Commission for my ignorance (something I generally confess only to my professors). Nevertheless, I feel I accord at least as much importance to this body as does the Varsity, which relegated the article in question to the final pages of that issue.

In view of the truth of the matter, I can only assume that the reporter either "was not aware" of the facts, or else "knew but didn't care".

. . . new approaches for a stronger SAC

Students don't want SAC to spend all its time looking inward. The Hill-McElwain-Sober ticket will work on the problems facing the U of T and for better SAC services.

• CUTBACKS IN THE UNIVERSITY

The new U of T budget shows the facts are with us. Across the board cuts mean larger classes, fewer TA's, fewer library books, librarians and shorter hours. SAC must blanket the campus with information on the issue, and work with students to maintain the quality of education.

• SAC SERVICES

Services should not be seen as a way to 'generate revenue'. After all, you've already paid your SAC fees. We support continuing programs such as the free films, Ski Days, concerts and pubs, which bring students together on campus for a reasonable cost.

- The SAC phone Directory should again be distributed free of charge, and paid for by advertising.
- The free film series downtown should move to Convocation Hall, so overcrowding at the Med. Sci. auditorium can be avoided.

• DECLINING STANDARDS?

The U of T's proposal to face declining enrolment is to reduce Grade 13 entrance requirements to 70% on the St. George campus and 60% at Erindale and Scarborough. This is not the answer. We cannot allow our diplomas to become worthless. SAC must press for a change in funding from the BIU system to one which would not erode educational standards.

• CAMPUS CENTRE

SAC must push for the immediate phase of the Campus as Campus Centre project, involving student lounge space. We are not willing to allow Simcoe Hall to put off these plans until the late 1980's.

• STUDENT AID

The new OSAP plan unveiled by Dr. Parrott is a step backwards from the old plan. SAC must work to reduce the amount that parents are expected to contribute and work to end the four-year limit on grant eligibility.

Daffydil blossoms for spring

By BARBARA ANDREW and PAUL RANALLI

Daffydil, the longest running revue on the U of T campus, opens next Wednesday through Saturday at Hart House. The revue is written, produced and choreographed by students from medicine and other health faculties.

Daffydil has a long and chequered history. Even its date of conception is a matter of dispute. The show goes back at least to 1897 and possibly even 1889, which would make this year the 90th performance.

One of the best known Daffydil performers was current U of T president John Evans. He participated in all his four years and had "enormous fun" in doing so. His most notorious role was that of the monster Frankenstein. Each night he waded into the audience to carry off a professor's wife, or any other nubile young maiden who struck his fancy. "The strange thing was," recalled Evans recently, in a voice of surprise, "that none of the husbands ever once objected!"

Another of Evans' critically acclaimed performances was that of a mummy emerging from a casket. "Of course," Evans allowed modestly, "people were selected for these roles because of natural talent." Evans also enjoyed the distinction of being the "only one in the cast with no makeup on."

Daffydil started, so the story goes, when the dean of Medicine discovered some medical students cavorting in an anatomy classroom. Shocked, the dean told them that any fooling around must be done on their own time. "Medicine is an upstanding profession," he said. The students took him at his word and Daffydil was born.

The first few performances were styled after the Punch and Judy show and were held in the lecture theatre of the old Medical College at the corner of Gerrard and Sackville Streets. Only students were allowed to attend in these early years. Various professors were mimicked and "a riotous evening was spent."

The name "Daffydil" was first bestowed on the medical antics in 1912. In that year the fun-loving dean gave the students $100 to finance a Medical Stunt Night to be held in Convocation Hall. The dean himself played violin in the orchestra and continued to do so for the next decade.

For years the revue was linked to an institution called "Epistaxis" (nosebleed) to the uninitiated. This was the name given to the Daffydil program, which contained jokes, cartoons and burlesques of hospital and student life. Printed in the Meds colours of red, white and black, it said what those on stage dare not say "for the censor knows no cure for Epistaxis."

The issue in sports:

By Glynis Peters
and Hugh Stuart

On January 11, the U of T Athletic Council ruled that women could not participate in male intramural sports. In today's feature, Varsity Sports reporters Hugh Stuart and Glynis Peters look at the issues involved in that decision, and examine the evidence on the pros and cons of women in coed contact sports.

Joan Smith takes the pass from her male teammate at the centre line and heads toward the opposition net. She gets to the blue line and "crunch". Some aspiring Brian Glennie has left her in a heap on the ice. Is it a neck injury? Has she dislocated her elbow? Was the University negligent? Will she sue?

Convention dictates that a female hockey player would have been more seriously injured than her male counterpart. Until concrete evidence is presented to the contrary, the Athletic Council of the University of Toronto is willing to accept the status quo and prohibit women from playing contact sports with men.

On January 11, the Athletic Council passed a ruling preventing women from playing competitively against men in the sports of soccer, lacrosse, football, hockey, boxing, wrestling, field hockey and basketball.

Naturally, there were some members of the university community who immediately took offence to this ruling. As of yet there is insufficient evidence to convincingly support the position of either those for or against this ruling.

Myths and Taboos

The primary interest of those involved in making the ruling was the welfare of female athletes. No members of the Council were sure whether women are indeed more susceptible to injury than men. One man that the Council turned to was highly-regarded U of T Physiologist Dr. Bob Goode.

Goode feels that women today are not physically fit enough to play contact sports against men. However, he points out that women are not born weaker than men. It is society's taboo against letting girls play alongside boys in the strenuous activities of childhood that puts women at a disadvantage from the start.

Until the age of puberty leg strength of males and females is comparable, states Goode. "At the age of seven, a boy already has a stronger upper body than a girl because he plays harder."

Lack of participation in physically demanding sports at an early age has left the average U of T woman with a lower strength factor than the average U of T male. University women have weaker necks, backs and arms. But according to Goode, this state of affairs can be remedied.

First, myths such as the belief that weightlifting will make women look masculine must be destroyed. Goode explains "a woman can increase her strength by thirty percent yet only add a quarter of an inch to her body size. Attitudes must change. Women must become more aware of their physical potential, and they must not be scared to develop it."

Because of their lower strength factor, and because the average woman is twenty percent smaller than the average male, Goode dismisses as ridiculous, any desire of present day women to play football or hockey with men. He agrees that until women at some university actually play co-ed contact sports, all arguments can only be based on supposition. Even then any results will lack credibility until women are given the opportunity to achieve the same fitness and skill level as the average male.

No Concrete Evidence

A study conducted by Australian social biologist, Dr. Ken Dyer, adds support to Goode's conclusion. Using Olympic results as evidence, Dyer shows that the sex differential in track athletics and swimming performances is declining steadily. Until 1967, women were not allowed to compete in the 1500 metres at the Olympic Games. They were deemed incapable of running such distances. At that time the biological reasons proffered seemed inarguable. Dyer points out that in the 12 years since these claims, women have improved more rapidly than men in this and other track events. (See table below.)

If women are allowed to compete with men in men's competitive leagues, men's female sports leagues, such as field hockey. This is one of the questions involved.

Dr. Dyer concludes, "Clearly it was social preconceptions, not biological knowledge that prevented women from competing in so many events until recently." He goes on to maintain that although women may not in fact ever equal the sporting achievements of men, "what has now become absolutely clear is that the reasons they have not done so in the past are more social than they are biological."

Since no concrete physiological evidence can be produced to prevent women from playing contact sports with men, is the Athletic Council's ruling a violation of their civil rights?

What is at stake is the opportunity for each student at University of Toronto to optimize his or her athletic fees," says University of Toronto Ombudsman Eric McKee. By not allowing women to play contact sports, half the University's population is being discriminated against. Although the Ombudsman is presently studying the issue, he has only the power to make recommendations.

A Question of Rights

The January decision which denied the right of Sheila Lewis and Barbara McKay to compete for University College in the men's Intramural Soccer League has left the U of T open to investigation by the Human Rights Commission. Two similar cases have already been won in court by adolescent girls, but to this date university-age women have yet to test the ruling.

In spite of the arguments presented thus far, Jack Tweddle, U of T Insurance manager, still cites the physiological factor as being of prime importance.

If open sports are allowed and a woman is seriously injured, says Tweddle, the University could be sued on the basis of negligence.
Should a woman win such a case (it is impossible to predict the reaction of a jury), the inevitable rise in insurance rates would be very costly to the University, Tweddle says. "If a decision is made in favour of open sports, we would be opening ourselves up to claims that might not occur without them." To date, no precedents have been set at other universities and Tweddle is reluctant to let this U of T be the pioneer. His first consideration, he says, is for the safety of the women at the University.

Abby Hoffman, Consultant for Sport Canada and a witness in two

Board of Inquiry hearings of the Ontario Human Rights Board, dismissed the insurance argument at a February symposium sponsored by the SAC Women's Commission.
She is of the opinion that certain day-to-day activities at the University afford a greater insurance risk than open sports. For example, isn't a greater risk involved in handling toxic chemicals in U of T's science laboratories?

Bruce Kidd, a vocal advocate of open sports, also feels that the insurance argument is a weak one.
He bases his opinion on the argument that there is no difference between a fit woman playing football and an unfit male playing football. "Even walking across the battle-scarred back campus playing fields leaves us open to lawsuits."

Council willing to change

Anne Hewett, Director of Women's Athletics at Toronto, originally voted against open sports but is now seriously reconsidering her position. She believes "A woman who has played ice hockey and wants to play football is faced with the same risk as a male curler who wants to play football."

Like Hewett, almost all of the members of the Athletic Council seem willing to change their positions given more conclusive evidence. The men on the council are not male chauvinist ogres, both they and the women on the Council who voted against open sports had the welfare of female athletes in mind.

Director of Athletics Bud Fraser wants the matter settled in the near future. Says Fraser, "the easiest thing for us to do would be to turn our backs to the problem. In my twenty-seven years of coaching and administration I've seen nothing to make me change my mind. But I'm open. My question is this: Is there sufficient interest to form a separate women's soccer league, or is it just a handful of women who want to play?" (See Box this page.)

Recreation Coordinator Dave Copp runs U of T's intramural program on the basis of demand. In his travels to athletic conferences around North America, he has discovered that there is a strong demand at other universities for recreational, rather than competitive co-ed programs. As a result, U of T has established co-ed programs such as broomball and inner tube water polo. Copp adds,

varg feature

"We have seen the emergence of women's sport in the last ten years; they're getting stronger, but wouldn't they prefer to compete against other women?" Copp notes that women's leagues are growing around Toronto to accommodate this desire.

Field hockey for men?

Fitness Coordinator and Swimming Coach Robin Campbell has a different area of concern. "My feeling is that if you let women play in men's leagues, then how can you discriminate against a male field hockey player who wants to play in the women's league?" Campbell also notes that while open sport would not necessarily lower the level of competition, it might change the atmosphere of a sport. "A man would think twice before hitting a girl," explains Campbell, "or on the other hand he might chase her!"

But Instruction Coordinator Anne

Hewett dismisses such arguments.
Says she, "The essence of sport will prevail. Women will have to prove themselves skillwise and eventually a two-way respect will develop."

Unfortunately there are limitations of space, time and money common to most large universities which determine the extent to which co-ed sports can grow. Ideally there should be three options available to U of T students:
an open division, a male division, and a female division. In sports such as soccer, the university administration is studying the feasibility of such a plan.

Space And Money

But as Fraser points out, "you can have only so many games in a day."
Sharon Bradley, Associate Coordinator of Recreation, concurs and adds that if facilities were available, she would "rather see a much bigger women's program with modifications." But the question remains, whether the University of Toronto has the space and the money to accommodate a new branch of collegiate sport.

The issue of open sports at U of T deals with the end result and not the cause; in most cases the average male has had a 15 year head start on his female counterpart. Until Society's enforced athletic segregation of men and women at an early age ceases, women will always be at a disadvantage in their later attempts to compete on an equal basis with men.

It must become the norm for men and women to compete together from day one. Until such a situation does become the norm, it is unlikely that the U of T administration will see much reason to replace the present system of segregated contact sports.

A Surprising Result

By GLYNIS PETERS
and HUGH STUART

Sheila Lewis and Barbara MacKay, two law students, were barred from the University College men's soccer team in January.
Their plight instigated this statistics report by Patty Barclay and Lesley Thompson, who constructed a survey to determine whether or not a significant difference exists between the attitudes of males and females concerning women in contact sports. They realized that where women's rights were being debated, the rights of the males were not seriously being examined.

The sample group for the survey was taken from four points on the St.
George Campus: the Benson
Building, the Medical Sciences Building, Sidney Smith Library and the Arbor Room in Hart House.

One hundred and ninety-eight students, faculty members and other members of the university community were stopped as they walked past the sample points. No preference was shown for subjects questioned, except on the basis of sex in an attempt to equate the size of the groups.

The questions asked were:

- Do you think women should be allowed to participate in contact sports with men within the interfaculty league at the U of T?
- Do you think women should be allowed to participate in contact sports with men?

Differences between the responses to the first and second questions are negligible, indicating that views are not specific to U of T. The outcome (if the data is looked at regardless of sex) is (two to one (2:1) in favour of women participating.

The greatest weakness in the results was the doubtful sincerity of the answers and the amount of time spent considering the problem. If an individual had not previously spent time considering the issue he or she might express the accepted opinion, i.e. the male as a "chauvinist", and the female as a "libber".

Barclay and Thompson predict that within ten or twenty years, the question of women participating with men in contact sports will no longer hold a great deal of relevance.

Women must gain respect as athletes who can perform at a level comparable to men. This respect will lead to the needed improvements in facilities and coaching which will in turn increase the level of skill and competition.
Current rapid advancements in women's sports coupled with these advantages will soon make it unnecessary for women, in all sports, to look outside their sex for competition.

biological knowledge that prevented women from competing in so many events until recently.

GIVE SAC
$4.00 MORE...

ARE YOU CRAZY!

7 LEVEL HEADED REASONS WHY YOU SHOULD

(1) Why does SAC need a $4.00 fee increase?

(1) The SAC fee of $12.00 has not gone up since 1968. Prices have. SAC is doing a lot more things for a lot more people than it was doing in 1968.

Our SAC fees are the lowest university student council fees in Ontario. Even with the proposed increase, our fees will still be the second lowest in the province.

(2) But, I thought SAC had lots of money in the bank.

(2) Yes, that's true. And we have been using that money up. We have not gone to you to vote on permission to increase the fee, instead we have been falling back on our surplus. That is now coming to an end.

(3) Isn't there somewhere else to get the money from?

(3) So as to increase our revenues, SAC charges for Pubs, Riding Stables, the Directory, Caps and Gowns, Roam Arounds, Ski Days, ads in the Handbook, and we have even been forced to raise the price of pop to 20 cents at our downtown office. But still it is not nearly enough. SAC is a non-profit organization that receives the bulk of its money from the students it represents.

(4) SAC probably just wastes our money on administrative diddling around.

(4) Three years ago, the percentage of the SAC budget spent on administrative expenses was 25%. This past year it was 22%. Most student councils in Ontario have administrative and executive expenses that take up over 30% of their budgets.

(5) I don't like how SAC spends my money now.

(5) Good. Change it! SAC does a lot of things and tries to serve a very wide variety of interests. But if you want to see new things offered or old things discontinued, our student council is designed to facilitate such changes. But first, SAC must stay afloat.

(6) When does the fees increase go into effect and why?

(6) The increase will become effective in September of 1979. Our long-range estimate is that we have enough money to carry us through until then.

(7) What will happen if SAC doesn't get the increase it is asking for?

(7) Starting next year there will have to be dramatic reductions in our activities and services if SAC does not receive the fees increase. Demands for new programs would not be able to be met. SAC would cease to be an effective vehicle for defending and serving your interests.

Tom Simpson breaks away

By TOM KUHN

And they're off! The Students Administrative Council (SAC) elections take place Wednesday and Thursday of this week and the presidential race is between two teams. Today The Varsity interviews the slates vying for the top places in 1978-79:

A person who is running against "old SAC hacks," against those who put "goals of SAC above that of students," is in a tough race against a current SAC vice-president for the SAC presidency.

Tom Simpson (Engineering IV) says it is "time to break away from it."

Simpson was a deputy commissioner for the SAC Communications, secretary-treasurer of the Varsity Committee as a SAC representative, a member of the Finance Commission, as well as the Engineering Council's university committee chairman this past year.

Simpson is running on a ticket with Rob Mowat, Erindale student president, and Dave Beaton, New College Student Council VP-Treasurer.

"We're going to have a lot of new faces at SAC next year. There are a lot of races for SAC seats. We need new ideas," Simpson said.

Cutbacks is the big issue this year, according to Simpson. "This past year SAC looked at the wider issue, student aid and unemployment. They largely ignored the issue of the quality of education," Simpson said.

"We have to provide a focus, what the students can really get a hand on in this cutbacks issue, the overcrowded classrooms, the cut courses and programs," said Simpson.

The university has been engaged in a policy of spread-the-poverty, according to Simpson. "It has called for 3 percent cutbacks on academic areas, 5 percent cutbacks on non-academic areas. That won't last long. Next year it will be cut courses and cut programs," Simpson said. Simpson advocates an open budgeting process for the university, so students can know where money is being spent. "Students could then put pressure on the administration for a more rational allocation of resources," he said.

Simpson also favors an altered budgeting process for SAC. "Right now everything is done in one meeting, the budget meeting," said Simpson. This leads to bad budgetary decisions, Simpson suggests.

"SAC has a few people at the top who make all the decisions, who do all the work," Simpson said. "The budget doesn't reflect our priorities," he stated.

Reorganization of decision-making would include a larger voice for student societies. "Dave Beaton has had experience at New College in services aspect. He will work to

As the Student Administrative Council (SAC) elections draw closer, the presidential slate of Brian Hill, Mark McElwain and Reva Sober grows more confident.

"We have nine of the 11 executive members of SAC backing us," Hill (SAC vice-president) said in an interview Friday afternoon.

"The quality of our education is going down the drain," McElwain (SAC Deputy External Commissioner) warned. SAC should be working with the U of T administration to fight cutbacks, but "let's not be so cozy that we can't criticize" the system, Hill advised.

"The administration's budgets are never cut. $108,000 was spent on renovating the Ombudsman offices which are slated for demolition in a couple of years; and yet 40 per cent of the periodicals at the Erindale library are being cut," Hill pointed out.

Hill, McElwain and Sober solidly support the SAC fees referendum. "The economic scale that has previously worked in our favor has turned against us," Hill said.

SAC too is being hurt by the decline in U of T enrolment; "for every less student there is, the fewer dollars there are. SAC has been spending $14 a year on every student when we're only bringing in $12 per student. If SAC was to run out of money it would not be as effective a force on campus, especially at a time when we will be battling the administration and the Government," Hill explained. Moreover, "the university listens to a group that is strong and healthy," McElwain added.

The three attributed the decline in U of T enrolment to three causes — the dropping birth rate that is finally hitting the universities; the fact that prospective students are being "scared off" by the bleak outlook for employment while at school and after convocation; and the increase in the number of students dropping out of U of T after their first year.

McElwain called the new student aid program "an incredible step backwards. The concept of being able to go through the first four years of university without a loan has been shown to be a hoax both by the higher parental contribution tables and the new recalculations of students' costs which have somehow decreased over the last year," McElwain said. He added: "For students to get the same amount of money as they would have under the old OSAP plan, they'll have to borrow on top of the grant."

The function of the SAC Services Commission "is not contrary to the political aspects," the members of the slate claimed. Sober (Nursing Services Commissioner) maintained that the Services Commission breaks down the barriers between colleges and faculties.

"It is necessary that students see their money working," she said. At SAC, "we're providing, asking, leading and directing," McElwain said. He maintained that one aspect of SAC cannot be alienated from the others.

On the question of apparent lack of support from the student body, the

CRUT fading, still fighting

By PAUL WILSON

The Committee to Reform U of T (CRUT), although a fading organization, continues to fight for its beliefs: to make the university a "more responsible and responsive institution."

At present it is opposing the expansion of St. Vladimir's Ukrainian Institute on Spadina Ave., as well as cutbacks in the university such as the closing of the legal aid centre.

At its meeting last Thursday it was evident that its members are not yet satisfied.

"For too long, the university has been an ivory tower, inaccessible to the public," said member Joan Doiron. "And it hasn't been responsible to its students, either. You can't even get an education let alone a job."

Doiron and the other members of CRUT feel that "although the university is an important public investment, members of the non-university community do not share equally in the benefits." They object to decisions made by Governing Council without first consulting the students and the outside community.

CRUT says the structure of Governing Council must be changed before it will listen to community concerns.

In a brief submitted to the Macdonald review, CRUT recommended that the council include an equal number of faculty and students.

CRUT proposed the following additions to Governing Council: four municipal appointees, two resident and ratepayer appointees from their organizations in the St. George campus area, eight labor appointees, two business appointees, and two teachers.

The Macdonald review considered these proposals but commented that if its recommendations for relieving Governing Council of much of its workload were followed, there would be no need for broadening the democratic base of authority of the university as CRUT advocated.

CRUT also says that U of T is more concerned with maintaining high numbers of students for provincial grant purposes than with supplying the students it has with a good education. "They will significantly lower the admission standards next year to get more students," said Professor Danny Goldstick. "They just miscalculated this year."

One of the biggest issues on which CRUT took a stand was the building of the new athletic complex. After losing that battle, the members began to fear for the future of the whole residential Huron-Sussex area.

Seven more reasons for SAC fee

By ANDREW MAHON and NEIL MICHAEL DAVIDSON

(1) Why does SAC need a $4.00 fee increase?

SAC is a large, explosive organization. It needs the fuel of many megabucks to generate enough power to keep all the parts working efficiently. A fee increase will provide the fuel to make SAC a winner.

(2) Surely this would only be true if SAC was entering the Daytona 500?

Yes.

(3) But I thought SAC had lots of money?

We did.

(4) What will you do with the extra revenue?

Many things. For instance, improve the quality of campus entertainment. Next September, we will be bringing Emerson Lake and Palmer to Dr. John's with their modest 75 piece orchestra. Of course this will mean slight renovations to the UC refectory — and that's where your four dollars comes in handy.

Also, we plan to extend the SAC ski days into SAC ski-weeks and eventually SAC ski-semester. We are also hiring a team of five specialists to rebuild John Tuzyk from the waist up. All this costs money.

(5) Can't you get the money anywhere else?

Of course we could, but we'd rather squeeze it out of you suckers.

Why don't you hurry up and get on with the questions. But seriously, we've tried all the regular methods — extortion, blackmail, petty larceny — but it just wasn't us. This is more our style.

(6) SAC probably just wastes our money diddling around.

Very perceptive. But why not let these figures speak for themselves: 75 percent, 56 percent, 8.3 percent, 91 percent. Impressed? You should be. SAC spends more money than any other university council on these statistics. And with that fee increase we can provide even more statistics just like those.

(7) What will happen if SAC doesn't get the increase it is asking for?

We're glad you brought that up. We don't want to get nasty about this, but if necessary we will use force to insure our demands are met. Don't make us spend even more of your money training tank commandos and hand-to-hand combat specialists to ensure SAC's well-being.

"Yeh, make that three with onions, one with mayonnaise and charge it to SAC."

improve communication and cooperation between SAC services and the student societies on campus," said Simpson.

"Rob Mowat will be mainly concerned with communication with suburban campuses, particularly their services people. We can't co-opt those in the suburban campuses directly into SAC committees, so we have to have our ear to the ground and find out what suburban campuses want from SAC," said Simpson.

Simpson criticizes SAC for acting like a small student council. "It's much too big a business to be run like that," Simpson said.

"A full time pub, something I favor, is big business. It is one example. No one at SAC has done the research on it. Their small council thinking restricts them in their ideas. We ought to have more imagination," Simpson said.

Simpson also favors the concept of the Campus as Campus Center project. The narrowing of St. George Street, and the closing of Willcocks Street are financially possible, he said. "The south-west development project is going to happen. We'll get good students on the committee to get student space, and good landscaping there," Simpson said.

Simpson favors student support for Radio Varsity. Radio Varsity had been inoperative for two years until reactivated by Communications commissioner Doug Gerhart and Simpson this past year. The expensive radio broadcasting equipment had been lying unused.

A special student referendum would have to be held to finance Radio Varsity's getting an FM licence. "Despite college autonomy, there is a need for U of T identity. With a radio station, people will be able to listen and know what's going on at U of T," Simpson said.

Simpson calls his opponent (Brian Hill) the "establishment" candidate. He expressed concern that student interest in the race would be great enough to offset what he calls Hill's connection with "hacks."

"People don't come out for SAC presidential elections. The only people who vote are those who are already involved in student government on this campus," Simpson said.

"This year there are two good slates. The people ought to come out to vote," Simpson added.

trio believed that the small turn-out at recent SAC demonstrations and meetings is not evidence of growing apathy.

McElwain said, "Before there was always the temptation for students to turn a deaf ear to the cries of student politicians. But now the facts are with us; there is a three per cent cut across the board." McElwain thought that the Parrott meeting in January was one of the largest on campus for at least two years.

Hill, McElwain and Sober would like to see the relations between The St. George, Scarborough and Erindale campuses strengthened. Representatives from the suburban campuses and the downtown colleges and faculties met with SAC in a series of summer conferences last year to "hammer out" their differences, Hill reported. As a result, "SAC hasn't been faced with the referendums of people wanting to pull out," he continued. "Scarborough and Erindale have more services this year than they have ever had before," Hill maintained. "Next year, I would like to increase it," he said.

Along with the introduction of Epistaxis, 1914 was the first year of the Faculty Cup. Unlike today's show, each medical class put on a skit as part of a contest. The cup was awarded to the faculty's choice of the best skit of the evening.

The "earthiness" of the humour seems always to have been a subject of debate. Rumour has it that the show was actually closed down at one point because it offended the dean's sensibilities. The Varsity, (Jan. 29, 1914) carries the comment that "contrary to reports that have been circulated, the character of the performances is such that any one can bring a lady with the assurance that all humour is absolutely guaranteed fresh and pure." A Varsity headline (March 5, 1936) declared that "Atmosphere of Hart House Theatre Thickened and Beclouded by Puns, Parodies and Practically Pornography." The show moved from Convocation Hall to Hart House in 1929 leading to a Varsity headline "The chaste walls of Hart House were stormed."

This lack of inhibition finally reached a point where skits had to be reviewed by the Daffydil Committee before presentation. But the committee hasn't taken all the "frankness" out of the skits, and it still enjoys an unequalled reputation for raunchiness.

Daffydil has never had any trouble in recruiting its audiences. According to a 1914 Varsity, "There has been a little hard feeling at the scarcity of tickets;" once the faculty, med students and nurses had received their share, only 50 out of 500 seats remained for other faculties. For many years the attendance had to be limited to staff, students and immediate friends. Today, with a run of four nights, anyone and everyone is invited to attend.

The best seats for next week's run are available on Wednesday and Thursday nights; the Friday and Saturday performances are already virtually sold out.

Brockport no-show for Toronto Boxers

By ANDREW MAHON

Watching those heavyweights stumble around in televised million-dollar bouts, it becomes easy to forget what the sport of boxing is all about.

Last Friday night in the Upper gymnasium at Hart House some of the U of T boxing club were on hand to remind the small but enthusiastic crowd.

The Toronto boxing squad was supposed to meet a team of challenging pugilists from Brockport State N.Y. but the American fighters never showed up.

However, the audience was still treated to some interesting exhibition bouts. In the first match Canadian amateur welterweight champion John Rafferty took on Mark Shea. Rafferty, the more experienced and polished boxer, moved deftly around his opponent, scoring easily with a constant assortment of jabs and combinations. In the third round, Shea managed to land a few interesting blows before his mouthpiece fell out, and the round ended.

In other exhibition bouts, Jason Lo took on Chi Lian Wang in the 125 lb. weight class in a fight which saw Lo practising some fancy footwork and showmanship which he must have picked up from Ali himself.

Other bouts featured Richard Wright (at 139 lbs) against Eli Kivitty (at 147 lbs.) and a curious mismatch between tall rangy Steve Way (156 lbs.) and Joe Pelletie (170 lbs.).

But the highlight of the evening was the match-up between brothers John and Paul Rafferty. Both sporting their Cabbagetown BYC livery, they sparred for three rounds of entertaining boxing.

Although John Rafferty had the superior style and agility, it was Paul Rafferty who provided the most excitement with his strong persistent attack. He was well able to handle the welterweight champion through three rounds of fast-paced sparring — there was even time for some brotherly kibitzing during the match.

After the bout Paul Rafferty admitted he was just trying to get through the match. "I haven't been in the ring since June," he said "but John seems to have a lot of time for it."

Both brothers are at U of T. John is in his second year of a general arts program while Paul is in his third year studying French and English.

After the match, Coach Tony Canzano said he was "very pleased" with the fight.

"We put on a good show in Brockport but we haven't heard from them since we were down there," he said. "I understand this happens a lot at other universities, but never before to us."

Gymnastics Anyone?

The University of Toronto Gymnastics Club is holding an open house for the U of T community, this week.

The open house, which features demonstrations and instruction classes by the club's participants, takes place next Tuesday and Thursday from 6:30 to 8:00 p.m. and Saturday from 9:30 a.m. to 12:30 noon.

Club members will provide an opportunity to all gymnasts, would-be gymnasts and armchair gymnasts to share in the progress of the U of T Gymnastics Club and in the joy of the sport.

Potential members can see the program in operation and meet with instructors to find their place among the balance beams, floor mats and uneven parallel bars. Club membership is open to females eight years and over.

The open house will be held in the Benson Building.

St. Mike's Sweeps Interfac Doublebill

By HUGH STUART

During the final weeks of the regular season schedule, the St. Mike's A hockey team was hoping to avoid playing Phys Ed in the first round of the Interfac A division hockey play-offs. SMC got their wish, but they also got more than they expected from a stubborn New College team in a game played last Friday.

The first period was a lacklustre affair that featured some good hitting and little else. Toward the end of the frame, St. Mike's started to take the play to New College but they couldn't solve the goaltending of New's Horowitz.

SMC turned their edge in play into two early second period goals and added two more late in the third to salt the game away and give them a 4-0 victory.

The difference in the game was the superior speed of the St. Mike's forwards who found plenty of skating room against a porous New College defence. Horowitz could not be faulted on any of the goals as two were scored on breakaways and two more came from rebounds.

Mike Flintoff led the way for St. Mike's with a pair of goals, while Brian Kelly and Steve Platt connected for singles. John Borcsak, Dan Feraday, and Guido Mazza each contributed an assist to the SMC effort. Although they had the game in control, St. Mike's goalie Jim Ranieri was forced to come up with some tough stops against a quick New offence.

SMC now advances to the next round of playoff play as they meet Erindale in a two-game total goal series. Erindale finished in second place during the regular season and are coming off a 7-0 whumping of Meds in the first round of the playoffs.

St. Mike's enjoyed another victory defeating Scarborough 93-83 in a second-round basketball playoff game played last Friday, but they can't afford to relax. They have to face Scarborough again tomorrow night for the second game of their two-game total point series, and in the light of the potent Scarborough offence, a ten-point cushion is not enough.

In Friday's game, the half time score was 40-40, and St. Mike's never pulled farther ahead than eleven for the rest of the game. With five minutes remaining to play, three consecutive baskets by centre Steve Prince had pulled Scarborough to within five. But Andy Bais, who had scored 34 points in SMC's previous playoff victory over Erindale, replied with some hot shooting of his own to put the game out of reach.

It was the outside shooting of Bais and Rick Voell that proved to be the difference for SMC as they accounted for 34 and 18 points respectively. Brent Hubbard was the downtowners inside threat and scored 20 points, 15 in the second half. Sean Brody also netted 14 for the victors.

Prince controlled the defensive boards for Scarborough and scored most of his 23 points from inside. Dave Sooley netted 14 points and pesky Rob Keifer added 13.

Tomorrow night's game promises to be a classic as St. Mike's attempts to avenge their football playoff defeat to Scarborough in the first term.

St. Mike's taking a face-off in the New College end.

sports

Around-the-basket action in St. Mike's, Scarborough game.

Playoffs

It's coming down to the nitty gritty in the interfac leagues. In hockey, teams are going into two-game total point series. Today at 8:00 p.m. and Wednesday at 6:30 p.m. St. Mike's and Erindale clash for the right to play the winner of the Victoria College series which will be played today at 10 p.m. and Wednesday at 10 p.m.

In basketball, two game total point series are already in process. St. Mike's carries a ten point edge into Tuesday night's second game against Scarborough. Knox College will be facing either Senior Engineering or Dents "A" today and Thursday at 7 p.m. Typical of all playoff competition, the games should feature some terrific, emotionally inspired action and would be well worth a visit.

Also, in other sports action, the women's intramural ice-hockey championships in the recreational division take place tonight at 7 p.m. at Varsity arena.

In this dynamite match-up, St. Mike's B team takes on the unwieldy forces of the legendary Rehab II team.

Wrestler turns in Boss effort

By JIM O'LEARY

U of T student Erik Boss emerged out of a large field containing most of the best young wrestlers in the country to take second place finishes in two events in the Canadian junior wrestling championships held at the Etobicoke Olympium on the weekend.

The championships, for wrestlers under 21 years of age, drew over 250 competitors from coast to coast in Canada and the United States.

Fighting in the heavyweight division on Saturday, Boss took second in the freestyle competition and followed this with another second in the Greco-Roman competition yesterday. His only losses in the tournament were to national team member Wyatt Wishart.

Wyatt went through the three-day competition without a defeat. His list of past achievements is impressive. He placed third in the junior world championships and eighth in the senior world championships last year. He also took two golds at the 1976 Pan-Am wrestling championships.

Boss is no slouch either when it comes to international achievements. In the 1976 junior Pan-Am championships in El Salvador, he took a gold in the Greco-Roman and a silver medal in the freestyle. He followed this with two silver medals in the junior Pan-Am games in Ecuador last year.

In the freestyle competition on Saturday, Boss fought five matches and recorded three pins, an 8-6 decision and a loss. In the Greco-Roman section yesterday, he had two wins by pins before his loss to Wishart.

Speaking of Wishart, Boss said, "to finish eighth in the seniors and third in the juniors in world championships, you've got to be pretty good. The guy's tough, quick, agile and smart."

Boss now leads a contingent of U of T wrestlers to the Canadian senior championships in Edmonton next weekend. Joining Boss will be OUA 177 pound champion Jack Preobrezenski, Al Tamane, Sam Turchiano, Al Kosugi and assistant coaches Rob Moore and Clive Llewellyn.

This tournament will provide the U of T squad with some of the best opposition they are likely to ever face. As well as top Canadian talent, teams will also be sent from the United States, Cuba and Europe.

Side Line By-Line

One of the highest honours a university athlete can receive is to be named to an All-Canadian team. All-Canadian means that the athlete is recognized among the country's top competitors in his field.

Selection of All-Canadians is a task which should not be taken lightly. An athlete should only be selected when he demonstrates all the attributes of a Canadian university athlete. He should show a combination of ability, dedication, and a belief in the underlying philosophy which guides university athletics in this country.

Athletics at Canadian universities were built on the supposition that the institution's primary concern was to foster an atmosphere combining opportunities for athletes to achieve excellence in both scholastics and athletics. Our philosophy has been deliberately different than the philosophy in the United States where, in many universities, academics takes a back seat to athletic achievement.

In the U.S., the philosophy often dictates that an athlete achieve excellence at all costs. When he is successful enough to become one of the best in the nation, he is awarded the title of All-American. He is judged only on his achievements on the rink, field or court.

Traditionally, Canadian athletes have had to strive for higher standards to receive All-Canadian honours. Not only must they excel in their sport, but they must also maintain good marks to remain in school.

If the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union (CIAU) pursues its present course, the title of All-Canadian could come to mean very little in the future.

The announcement of this year's All-Canadian basketball team shows that the spirit of All-Canadian honours is being lost.

Three of the starting five played four years of American ball before coming to Canada. They found their way to Canada by what must be considered a questionable route.

CIAU rules prohibit giving scholarships or making recruitment payments to athletes. We are supposed to believe though, that two players from Philadelphia transferred to Laurentian University strictly to further their education. Or maybe they heard about the great weather they have in Sudbury at this time of year.

If the CIAU enforced the rules as they should, many of these American ringers would probably get kicked out and the teams that brought them in, suspended. Instead, the league has chosen to turn the other way, and pretend that no rule violations have occurred. By doing this they are making a farce out of the awards and degrading the awards of all those who are true All-Canadians.

There is no questioning the ability of these three ball players. Loren Killion of Laurier led the country in scoring and set a new Ontario record for points scored, with a 33.9 average. Bruce Burnett and Charlie Wise are two Philadelphians who have proven they are great basketball players up in Laurentian. Burnett led the conference in scoring while Wise has proven to be the type of guard every coach dreams about.

Just because a player comes from the U.S. does not mean he should be ineligible for All-Canadian honours. Anyone who attains the high standards which have been established should be eligible.

These players should not be recognized however, until it is clear they came to this country for the proper reason and intend to live up to the standards established by the legitimate All-Canadians who have gone before them. Anything less than this will only result in the degradation of what should be a prestigious award.

"Biggest student demo ever"

By ROBERTA CLARE and KATHY CANTY

"They say Cutbacks. We say Fight Back... Hey Hey Ho Ho Harry Parrott's gotta go," shouted approximately 7,000 Ontario students and faculty members who marched on Queen's Park yesterday.

The chants became louder and more frequent when the crowd learned that William Davis, Ontario Premier, and Harry Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities, refused to address the rally. For about an hour after the demonstration, the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) tried to send the crowd home but the frustrated demonstrators attempted to storm the barricades shouting, "We want Davis" and sung "Har...ry Har...ry."

It was called the biggest student demonstration in Canada's history.

After hearing the speeches of the leaders of the provincial opposition parties, the crowd cried for the reaction of the Progressive Conservative Government.

"I am impressed with the demonstration," Stuart Smith, Liberal opposition leader said. "Twenty years ago I was leading a demonstration just like this one in the province of Quebec. We won our battle and we hope that you win yours."

The opposition leader, who faced boos from the crowd said, "We have to become a nation that uses educated people." "The thing that worries me the most is the uncertain future that lies before our young people. The education that they are receiving is often not geared to their full needs," Smith explained.

"I have not yet heard a good reason why the graduate students should be eliminated from OSAP," Smith said. "I think it's a legitimate concern students have," he added.

"The NDP unanimously supports your protest today and we hope it succeeds," Michael Cassidy, NDP leader said in his address to the rally. "We support your demands for a revised student assistance program. We say Harry Parrott's dead wrong. We say in the NDP that cutbacks in the public sector are wrong," he stated.

Cassidy charged that the budget that came down from the legislature was "most outrageous." It continues the attack on ordinary working people," he said. "You are the workers of the future and we need a highly capable work force," Cassidy told the students.

Cliff Pilkey, President of the Ontario Federation of Labor (OFL) charged, "Parrott said today that the Government was not cutting back on grants and there was a 5.7 per cent increase. What Harry didn't tell us was that 5.7 per cent doesn't cover inflation." He concluded, "I wish you every success and tell you that the OFL will continue to fight."

Convocation Hall packed in demonstration warm-up

By ANDREW MAHON

Students from universities all over Ontario jammed into Convocation Hall yesterday for a pre-demonstration rally.

The rally, which started at 1 p.m., was designed to organize students for the march to Queen's Park. Students from McMaster, Queen's, Waterloo, Trent and Carleton attended to hear pre-arranged speakers and await the arrival of large contingents from York and Ryerson.

Some enterprising McMaster students marched onto the stage with a coffin to symbolize the death of education. The pall bearers (dressed as parrots) set the coffin down, and the McMaster student president then presented a eulogy.

Other speakers included Graduate Students' Union vice-president Leo Casey and U of T Coalition against Cutbacks representative Paul Campbell.

The impatient crowd was eventually instructed to leave the building, university by university.

The U of T contingent was last.

Coaxed by speeches and announcements of more students arriving outside Con Hall, the rowdy audience filed enthusiastically outside where the procession stretched most of the way around Kings' College Circle.

Armed with signs and yelling slogans like "Save us from Davis," the 7,000 students made their way to the Legislature Buildings.

Walking innocuously with the U of T students was student council president John Tuzyk who was "extremely pleased with the turnout."

"By Tuesday I knew it would be a success," said Tuzyk, "from the feedback I was getting from cafeterias and residences."

Helping to direct student traffic was a Metro Police staff sergeant who said police measures for the demonstration were "minimal. We've been given assurances by the organizers that it will be an orderly function," he added.

Hill 2 - 1 over Simpson SAC loses fee hike

By SEANDUNPHY

Brian Hill won a resounding victory over Tom Simpson in a campaign characterized by voter apathy and ignorance. The ticket of Hill, Sober and McElwain garnered 2,200 votes to 1,043 votes for the ticket of Simpson, Mowat and Beaton. There were more than 27,000 students eligible to vote in the elections.

Hill, a Scarborough College student, becomes the first SAC president from a suburban campus (to lead) since 1971 when Rod Hurd from Scarborough held the post.

Hill attributed his victory to solid Scarborough College support coupled with wide St. George and Erindale backing generated by a well-organized and hard fought campaign. Although pleased with his electoral victory, Hill was "extremely disappointed" with the defeat of the referendum on the raising of SAC fees.

The referendum lost by a vote of 1,952 to 1,518. Hill said that students will have to expect "serious cut-backs in student services," with a greater emphasis on a philosophy of "user pay." He said that the referendum defeat was due to a failure to take the campaign directly to the students in the classroom.

Simpson congratulated Hill on his victory, saying that harder work on the part of Hill, combined with a low voter turnout were the major reasons for his defeat. The low turnout, which he said was a combination of poor Varsity coverage of the campaign, a short campaign period, and students' being drawn off campus for the anti-cutbacks demonstration at Queen's Park, hurt his prospects of victory by diminishing the downtown vote.

Turnout 'surprising'

By PETER HOHENADEL and ANDREW MAHON

After the rally, The Varsity asked students who were leaving what they felt about the demonstration at Queen's Park.

David Fallis, a fourth-year Music student at U of T was impressed by the demonstration. "I was surprised at the turnout. It shows that there's a lot of interest. I noticed that there was a smaller contingent from U of T. I think as a symbolic act it will have an effect on the Government," he said.

Chris Sullivan from Algonquin College also thought the rally was "pretty successful." Sullivan thought it was unfortunate that Davis didn't come out to speak. "But I know what Davis would have said, and it would only have made matters worse. If Parrott had come out, he would have just been covering up for Davis. I respect the people who stayed and waited, anyway," he said.

Frances Waldman from Ryerson was impressed by the turnout at the rally. "But I don't think it'll do any good," she said.

While the demonstration was going on outside the legislature, former education minister Tom Wells was inside giving a small speech to a group of Grade 11 History students.

"It's easy to whip up a protest," Wells explained to the students who were curious about the rally. "With 60,000 students in the province, a turnout of 4,000 isn't really that significant."

After the group left the area, The Varsity asked Wells for his impressions of the rally. "It's a good group out there," said Wells. "I hope you people get some of the answers you're looking for."

Cutback budget passes

By KATHY CANTY

Governing Council strongly endorsed the 1978-79 Budget Report yesterday, despite a plea put forward at the meeting by Bob Gibson, chief steward of grounds maintenance, that this budget will mean the phasing out of 31 nightwatchmen jobs.

"I've never had to plead for a man's job in my life," said Gibson. But the prospect of job losses for so many people compelled him to make this speech before council, he said.

If these men are fired "who's going to look after those buildings? Who's going to maintain them? Why is it you always stab us in the back" when the money gets tight? he asked. "You had the biggest rally ever today. I was proud of it, and proud to be a Canadian. I wish they were here today" at the meeting, said Gibson.

About 30 students from the demonstration had made an unexpected appearance at the council meeting and responded to Gibson's speech with cheering and applause.

The policy of the administration is not to dismiss staff whenever it can be avoided, and every effort will be made to find other jobs at U of T for the watchmen, said U of T president John Evans. Other members argued that the watchmen were only the largest group of many people at U of T who will be dismissed because of cutbacks.

Just prior to the vote on the budget the student demonstrators marched out of the meeting apparently protesting the imminent passage of the report.

Also passed at the council meeting yesterday were the salaries and benefits recommendations made by Daniel Soberman, the mediator between the U of T Faculty Association (UTFA) and Simcoe Hall.

Evans said he had met with UTFA President Jean Smith to try to find a compromise between the administration's position and the mediator's proposals. With inflation running at 9 per cent the administration thought it would be fairer to eliminate certain benefits and use that money to augment the 3.75 per cent salary increase, said Evans. But UTFA refused this offer.

John Basset felt that the mediator's proposals were quite favorable to Simcoe Hall. "I think we should grab it," he added.

Sit-in breaks up for demonstration

By SHANE PARKHILL

Twelve students and faculty ended their 48-hour occupation of U of T president John Evans' offices Wednesday morning. The group appeared on the steps outside Simcoe Hall with their sleeping bags and supplies at 9 a.m. to give a press conference.

Although Evans refused to give in to any of the group's six demands, the group's spirits remained high throughout the occupation. They said they decided to leave Simcoe Hall because they had already succeeded in getting considerable publicity from the mass media. They also felt that since there was little indication that Evans would reschedule classes their time would be better spent preparing for the rally.

At the press conference Inns College Students' Administrative Council representative Kate Bishop read a statement on behalf of the occupiers.

"Our occupation has succeeded in making the people of Toronto aware of the rapidly deteriorating situation in Toronto's colleges and universities," she said. "It has succeeded in making the students, faculty and staff of the University of Toronto aware of the administration's failure to stand up against the Government's policy of underfunding and cutbacks. Their lack of response to our six demands is the clearest illustration of that fact."

Bishop also stated that the new student aid program and high unemployment were making the education system "less and less accessible, both in general and in respect to the children of poor and working people in particular . . . A enrolment figures (in Ontario universities) must be re-examined. As the numbers go down the costs of maintenance do not," he pointed out.

According to Cook, "tuition fees should be eliminated in the long-run" but there are other pressing issues that must be handled first.

The Liberals, on the other hand, believe that students should pay "18 to 20 per cent" of their tuition. "The Government is making policy decisions without announcing them as such," John Sweeney, Liberal critic for Colleges and Universities, charged. The Government claims that its policies are "fully open" but in practice are not, he said.

Golombek suggested that Harry Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities, may have forgotten to tell the public that the Ontario Council on University Affairs (OCA) recommended a $67-million budget but gave the universities only $41-million.

"Students can no longer be called an apathetic core," Edelson said. In discussing the "turbulence" of the crowd, Edelson pointed out that there is a possibility of "turbulence or tension between the leaders" and members of any demonstration. She added that the turbulence did not reflect the general opinion of those present at yesterday's rally.

"You blew it Miriam"

Harry Parrott wanted to speak but refused to. Bill Davis chose to speak elsewhere.

Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities, was not invited by the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) to address yesterday's rally at Queen's Park. OFS felt "it was appropriate to invite the party leaders, and the party leaders only." Cutbacks, said OFS, "are a result of policies determined by more than just one minister."

Nevertheless, Parrott had expected to be invited to the rally and had a speech prepared.

While the rally was in progress, Parrott came down from his office at Queen's Park to watch the demonstration. As he left, Miriam Edelson, OFS Chairperson approached him: "They want you, Harry." Parrott replied: "I'm sorry, Miriam, we made an arrangement . . . you had your opportunity and you blew it. Let that be on your head; you made the decision. Now live with it."

When asked what he thought of the demonstration Parrott replied: "I would have liked the opportunity to talk."

To a reporter Parrott said: "You do an assessment of this year's student aid program and compare it to last year's and you'll find that students have a better deal."

Ontario Premier Bill Davis had a two o'clock speaking engagement with the Ontario Credit Union League at the Royal York Hotel.

Evans wants funding by academic merit

By KATHY CANTY

Government funding of universities should be based on the quality of their programs rather than enrolment, according to a statement issued by U of T President John Evans at the Governing Council meeting yesterday.

"So long as the general level of support is low and the distribution of support depends even indirectly on enrolment, the sheer survival instinct will dictate to all institutions a high priority for the enrolment of students. Herein lies the danger of a 'war for warm bodies,'" said Evans.

To offset this competition among universities for students, the Ontario Council on University Affairs should come up with a new method of funding, and be given the power to distribute these funds, Evans stated.

Evans said that he recommends a system of funding by excellence "in the knowledge that the University of Toronto would probably suffer least under the current arrangements in the period of enrolment decline. But the health of the whole system should be the number one consideration."

In an interview after the meeting Evans conceded that funding by excellence will probably never be accepted because any method for judging quality would have to be subjective.

Asked if this new funding method would bolster the U of T at the expense of smaller universities, Evans replied that these universities are the hardest hit by the present system of funding anyway.

Some enjoyed the demonstration, while . . .

... others definitely didn't.

Our Cops Are Tops!

Apathy, what apathy? The word will never be heard again, not after yesterday's rally at Queen's Park. Seven thousand people turned up at what has already been billed as the largest student demonstration in Canadian history. The anger and the persistence of the students put an end, once and for all, to hollow talk about student apathy. We don't need to congratulate those who showed up at the demo because by showing up they were only helping themselves. The view of masses and masses of students venting their anger in front of the legislature was a reward in itself.

In future for apathy we may have to substitute the word "sell-out". That's the only word that can possibly describe the behaviour of the student hacks — Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) hacks as well as lesser figures from the Graduate Students' Union, SAC and other student councils — at the demonstration. According to official sources there were 51 policemen at the demonstration, 20 of them "auxiliaries" or volunteers. In point of fact the number of volunteers was larger, their ranks having been swelled by a number of student "leaders". We were witnesses to the comical spectacle of GSU Vice-President Leo Casey trying to tear down a "Fight Clubbaks" banner when it got too close to the police cordon for respectability's sake. We were also there to watch our own marshals link arms with the police to push back students.

And then there was Kevin ("I'm not a sell-out") Schwenker of Ryerson telling people that if Davis did not come to us the only thing left to do (catch your breath) was to go home. To those willing to go along with this capitulation Kevin was nice enough to offer free donuts. But then of course we did not expect any better from Kevin. His motive for going to Queen's Park was to demonstrate to the government how "reasonable" we are. Cute, Kevin, very cute.

We could go on and on with the list of betrayals by the people who are supposed to be leading us against our common enemy: the government. Each example, however, would do no more than confirm what we already know, namely, that in our fight against cutbacks, student bureaucrats are not a help but rather an obstacle, that if we want to win our demands we have to organize without counting on the leaders we have now.

Still it was a great demonstration, an event which those who participated in will not forget for a long time. This is the beginning. We will have more demonstrations. The chants will get louder and louder and the crowd more and more militant.

Students, the Student Movement is alive and kicking. Harry Parrott is going to get more "input" than he ever thought was possible.

"Better calm down before our buddies here lose their patience."

McCarthyism

Thomas Kuhn's March 10 letter to The Varsity ("Elliot take no Seide") should be seen for what it is: a combined suppression of information and appeal to emotions which is characteristic of McCarthyism and which ought to be opposed by everyone who espouses the values Mr. Kuhn claims to uphold. I do not wish to involve myself in the dispute between Mr. Kuhn and Elliot Seide; the remedies available to Mr. Seide under the law of libel provide him with ample defense against Mr. Kuhn's statements. However, as chairperson of the Feb. 22 meeting of the GSU Council, I feel that there are certain facts which Mr. Kuhn has chosen to ignore, which ought to be made public.

The clear implication of the third paragraph of Mr. Kuhn's letter is that my actions as chairperson were partial. In addition, it is a reasonable reading of the third sentence of that paragraph that, as Mr. Seide's "substitute at the last GSU Council meeting," I am to be seen — like Mr. Seide and the GSU executive — as not committed to participatory democracy. Indeed, Mr. Kuhn has said to me, in the presence of witnesses, that GSU Council chairpersons are hired by the executive and simply do what they're told.

The problem with this view is that neither Mr. Kuhn, nor the others GASPS representative present at the Feb. 22 meeting, challenged a single ruling I made. Now under rules of order, it is assumed, in the absence of a challenge to a ruling by the chair, that the ruling is accepted by the meeting. And yet by Mr. Kuhn's own count, not one of "20 or 30" rulings that he was out of order was challenged. Nor did Mr. Kuhn or the other GASPS representative challenge any other ruling during the meeting.

Under these circumstances, it is incumbent on Mr. Kuhn to explain why he did not challenge any of these "20 or 30" rulings. I think the reason is clear: Mr. Kuhn has no use for the niceties of democratic procedures, because these procedures would limit his ability to claim "democracy" and "freedom of the press" for his position, by forcing him to justify his actions by more than unilateral declarations.

In view of the fact that neither Mr. Kuhn nor the other GASPS representative present at the Feb. 22 meeting chose to exercise his democratic right to challenge my rulings, Mr. Kuhn's subsequent imputations that my actions were partial, and that I do not subscribe to participatory democracy are, at the very least, examples of gross hypocrisy. As a strong believer both in democracy and a free press, I demand from Mr. Kuhn not only an explanation but a public apology.

Apologize to Horvath

As a close friend of Grad Post editor Maria Horvath, I can attest to the intense and often vicious harassment to which she has been subjected since late last fall in the course of her efforts to perform her job responsibly. In the face of this campaign of abuse, Maria has conducted herself with dignity and restraint.

Now that the Canadian University Press Investigation Commission has completed an intensive professional review of the Grad Post and has determined that there are no grounds for dismissal of the Grad Post editor, the GSU executive faces a clear choice: either (1) accept the commission's findings and recommendations, withdraw all relevant letters from her employment file, terminate the dismissal procedure and provide Maria with an apology (2) for challenging her professional competence without just cause or (3) continue to attempt to dismiss the editor despite the fact that there are no professional grounds for this action, thus indicating to reasonable observers that in this case their motives are other than professional in character.

All graduate students should be concerned. Should the GSU executive pursue this latter course of action, they would decisively discredit the GSU in the eyes of the university community.

The GSU executive recognized the legitimacy of the CUP investigation by actively participating in it. The executive presented their case to the commission and now, by all reasonable standards of common sense and common decency, they should act in accordance with the commission's findings and recommendations.

It would be patently absurd for the GSU executive both to maintain that they support the principle of freedom of the press and to refuse to act in accordance with the findings and recommendations of a commission whose function is to guarantee freedom of the student press across Canada.

It would be better for all concerned if the GSU executive were to halt the dismissal procedure, permitting Maria to do her job without interference for the remaining six weeks of her tenure. If the GSU refuses to follow the CUP recommendations and to accept the commission's finding that Maria is professionally competent, the most reasonable conclusion is that their motives are political, that they do not want a free and independent Grad Post because they do not believe in the principle of freedom of the press.

Now, Français

It is very commendable that M. Small "se donne la peine d'écrire" and article "en français" for the Varsity. It is also, quite liberal of the Varsity (La Varsite?) to print such a letter. However... I would like to point out (montrer du doigt) a few small errors. I am sure that the Varsity (La Varsite) "en serait reconnaissant."

First... (Primo...)

I would like to bring it to your attention that malgré que le tournure "malgré que" se trouve dans le langage populaire, it cannot replace "bien que" in written French. If M. Small is going to insist on using it (and La Varsite insist on printing it) then use the subjunctive with it. Ex: "Malgré que ces relations soient très tendues..."

Secondly... (Secundo...)

"Principal" and "electoral" used to qualify a noun which is masculine and in the plural should take the respective forms — "principaux" and "electoraux". It is, however, possible that this is neither M. Small's fault, nor La Varsite's, since it is the Deputy of de Bellefeuille who is being quoted here. Why, then, didn't the Varsite cover for themselves by the use of this handy little editorial gadget... (sic)?

Thirdly... (Tertio...)

Why does the author use inversion in the following sentence? "...A une question de l'assistance... a-t-il répondu que..." There's no direct quote involved, so why the inversion? It's archaic and snobby, and as far as the general tone is concerned, it doesn't sit too well with "malgré que". Think of Orestes going mad before the final curtain in Andromaque...

ORESTES: Ah! Merde! Pour qui sont ces serpents qui sifflent sur vos têtes! My example is hyperbolic, but illustrative of what I want to say.

Finally, why would an anglophone want to write an article in French for an English publication? Why would such a publication want to print it in the first place. If they are going to print it, why don't they get a francophone to edit it? If your paper is going to devote space to articles in French, your editing standards should be as high as for those articles submitted in English. As for anglophone students writing articles in French... please... save your efforts in French composition for your French profs.

If the Varsity (La Varsite) cannot extend these simple courtesies to francophones, then its paper isn't worth a hill of beans (Celine de binne!).

Who are the police?

On the whole, the Ontario Federation of Students and the other student organizations are to be congratulated for getting the students out to yesterday's rally at Queen's Park. The huge turnout and excellent spirit shown by the crowd are terrific signs of revitalized student power. The out-of-lowners are to be especially congratulated on making the trip.

But some very serious questions must be answered. Why were the student leaders protecting the police and the Legislature from students?

If a number of students — the size is not as important as the principle — wish to talk to their premier (even if it means occupying his office to do so), why were our fellow students preventing their friends and colleagues from doing so? Just whose interests were they out to protect?

The demonstration was a success in that it mobilized a very large group of students and, I hope, will bring pressure to bear on the Tory government. But the actions of the students pushing at the front of the line must be understood in the terms of why we had the demonstration in the first place. Demonstrations are only held if something is wrong that people believe should be righted. The OFS has not (and students in general have not) convinced the government to change their mind on the new OSAP plan, or cutbacks, therefore, we demonstrated.

Students wanted to hear an explanation from Davis or Parrott. But the failure to bring them out was unfortunate. They are cowards and did not want to face an angry crowd of 8,000 students. But going to them, and not just through the regular channels, is an effective way of showing our very real anger at the government's spending priorities. It can be seen as an extension of the demonstration.

The police are there to protect government property. Is that also the role of the student leaders? What are these people afraid of? Bad press reaction? The commercial press dumps on students all the time in any case, no matter what we do.

The reaction of John Q. Public? It is important for the public to realize how students are getting hurt, and some speakers to their credit, did mention the cutbacks in their proper context — of social service cuts so that the public will not think of students as being greedy and just out for themselves.

But marching on the Legislature might even show them better that students out there really hurt, and that it is the sons and daughters of the general public who are being hurt the most in their desire for a post-secondary education.

The next time, and there will be a next time, students will have had some real experience in the stress of facing the police, and if student demands aren't met, then the students themselves, not their present leaders, will carry the demonstration to its next location, which might be inside the Legislature.

Editorial freedom

In the past two years, I have supported two editors-in-chief of the Varsity, during "red-scare" campaigns. If I were a McCarthyite, as charged by the GSU chairpersons, they would surely know it at the Varsity. In fact, I'm clearly not. In principle I believe in editorial freedom. My defence of Maria Horvath (the Grad Post editor) is not a question of ideology; it's a question of conscience.

If the paid chairpersons of the GSU (Mr. Seide and Mr. Rachlis) are confused about the reason for my criticism of the GSU executive, I'll try to make it clearer. The GSU executive has grossly violated its own constitution and bylaws on two counts. They have failed to call the required ten GSU Council meetings. (In fact, they have only held four Council meetings the entire year.) They have secretly carried out dismissal attacks on the editor of the Grad Post, clearly an abridgement of the Grad Post's guaranteed editorial freedom.

The GSU executive along with some of their employees is guilty also of an outrageous cover-up of their illegal attacks on the Grad Post editor. Starting with the secret January 27 GSU executive meeting (disclosed in the Varsity) it's clear Johnson and Casey thought up "confidentiality" to prevent discussion of their actions. Even Peter Gallus, their fieldworker, who doubles as Maria's union steward, now admits there is no confidentiality under the laws of this country, when it's not in the contract; it would be clearly in violation of the GSU constitution in either case. In the last GSU Council meeting, the GSU executive stonewalled their Council's legitimate attempt to get access to information on how the executive has represented them in this case. Their paid chairperson has marked out a campaign of character assassination and vendetta in an attempt to silence me. It won't work.

Soviet Jews

It is a truism of social psychology that a falsehood repeated often enough in a moderately receptive atmosphere can gain credibility from the mere fact of repetition. The myth of official Soviet anti-semitism largely falls in this category.

For years our press, pulpit and other media have been hammering away on the theme that the Soviet government's "treatment of the Jews" is virtually akin to Nazi Germany's. (Forget for these purposes the historical fact that if Salin's government had not organized the large-scale evacuation eastward of Soviet Jews at the time of Hitler's invasion there would scarcely be any Soviet Jewish population today at all.) According to the currently fashionable version of truth, the USSR's two-and-a-half-million-plus Jews are all pining for nothing else so much as capitalist "freedom" as emigrants in the West.

Seldom is anything in the way of serious evidence presented for this proposition. To point at the two hundred thousand Jews who have in fact emigrated from the Soviet Union in recent years will hardly prove the eagerness to leave of the millions remaining. Indeed, Western propagandists seldom stress it since it contradicts their picture of a repressive Soviet prison-house locking and barring the door tyrannically to Jewish emigration.

According to Soviet government statistics, over 98 percent of Jews applying for emigration permits since 1970 have been granted them. Has anti-Soviet propaganda come up with a rebuttal of this claim? No. Has it even found it necessary to mention the claim? It has not.

In any case, the intensity of Zionist complaints about the USSR forcibly restraining reluctant Jews within its borders has scarcely varied in recent years, even though the number of emigrants lately has fallen back to a trickle (because the number of applicants has fallen). A common sense explanation would be that this is due to the fact that most of those wanting to go have left already, but no disproof of this possibility is even felt necessary by the Zionist propaganda machine.

However, any Zionist hopes of using Soviet immigrants to populate with Jews the Palestinian lands taken by Israeli aggression in 1967 have largely had to be disappointed, since Jews who emigrate from the Soviet Union often do not even want to go near Israel at all if they can help it. And the great majority of the USSR's Jews have throughout remained patriotic Soviet citizens largely unmoved by Western efforts to stir up trouble — whether the efforts of Jewish Zionists or non-Jewish ones, from Menachem ("Cairo was a seaport in the kingdom of King David") Begin to "human rights" advocate Jimmy Carter of Georgia. The majority of Soviet Jews in fact desire to stay in their country notwithstanding all that outsiders have done to create trouble between themselves and their fellow-citizens and thus swell the flow of emigration.

What we are dealing with here, of course, is an episode in the still-far-from-dead Cold War. The aggressive interests of Zionism in the Middle East and the Zionist lobby in North America are not even the principal force behind the daily propaganda barrage parroting allegations of official Soviet anti-semitism in all our media. The object is to combat the world movement towards decreased East-West tensions — i.e. the "detente" — and thus towards world-wide peace and away from World War III. You would think, to hear Western — including Canadian — diplomats at the recent Belgrade Conference, that Peace was somehow in one side's interests only, so that it was something to be traded-off and conceded only in exchange for balancing concessions made in return!

This brings us to the latest episode in the propaganda war. December 13th - U of T professors and deans Bernard Elkin, Arthur Kruger and Frederick Lowy circularize all Jewish Members of the Faculty (Q: Where did they get such a list?) in the following stark terms: "Anti-Semitism has reached a dangerous level in the Soviet Union, e.g., Jews are not allowed to qualify for the Ph.D. in mathematics (and probably not in physics or chemistry) and Jewish scientists are rarely, possibly not at all, allowed to leave the country to attend international conferences." Not a word of substantiation is offered for this charge, and in fact it is demonstrably false. The petitioners ask for authorization to press the Canadian cabinet to persuade the USSR to open its doors to Jewish emigration.

February 23rd - Dean James Ham, Father J.M. Kelly, and University Professor Louis Siminovich, backed by an impressive list of academic administrators, circularize all U of T faculty asking authorization to press the Prime Minister to "persuade the Soviet authorities, at the very least, to permit unhampered emigration for all those who have committed no crime but foresee in the Soviet Union a life of intolerable discrimination" on the grounds that their backers believe "that repression of freedom of thought and incitement to racial hatred are now carried on to a dangerous extent by the Government of the Soviet Union." Again, not a scrap of evidence is advanced. In the anti-Soviet climate of opinion prevailing, none is thought necessary.

The ultimate target, of course, is Peace. Many well-intentioned people have lent their names to one or more of these campaigns in the belief that they were thereby helping, not hurting, Jews and other minorities in the Soviet Union. They certainly did not intend to strengthen the forces for war and boost the chances of a real thermonuclear holocaust. But nothing less than that is what in fact is at stake.

Budget cuts stun departments

By HEATHER HILL

A stunning blow was dealt to the English and French departments in the faculty of Arts and Science in the form of an almost doubled budget cutback for next year.

A memo sent to the two departments last Friday by faculty dean Arthur Kruger proposed a cutback of 5.3 percent for the French department and a figure for the English department that sources said was "closer to six percent."

Kruger confirmed in a telephone interview last night that he has requested the departments to submit a budget for a Monday meeting.

Kruger, who said he was "not in a position to give out the figures of the individual departments," stated that while everyone knew there would be a cut of three percent in the faculty, not everyone knew the cuts in the individual colleges.

Sources in the French department said yesterday that the cut "puts in jeopardy many of the ongoing commitments of the French department and seriously jeopardizes the whole operation on the graduate level."

The sources, who described the French department as being in "a state of suspended animation," foresaw the cutbacks as heralding "the dismantling of the whole French department." They predicted that a number of teaching assistants as well as the faculty's exchange program with graduate students from France would be victims of the cuts.

The sources said the French department has responded to Kruger's memo by enumerating the consequences of the cuts, and are still awaiting his written response. "We still don't know the dimensions of the cuts that will descend upon us."

The sources said that many people are "completely unaware" of the cuts and that those who are are "dismayed and astonished at their proportions."

Larry Kerslake, acting chairman of the French department, said he intends to publish an open letter to the department faculty "some time after I have confirmation of what the faculty requires of us."

Kerslake said he would be deferring his budget till Tuesday and will wait for the faculty's response. He admitted that the exchange program "will have to be cut" but said he would try to keep up the level of T.A.'s.

Kerslake described the budget as still being "in a state of flux." He said that the department would survive the cuts, "but in what condition?"

Kerslake, who at first refused to comment until he learned who the reporter's sources were, concluded that he would have to "find out who's been talking out of school."

Milton Wilson, chairman of the English department, refused to name his budget target and simply said he would find out "When I submit the budget Monday."

Wilson then said that it would be "premature" for him to say what the budget figure is. He said he has gone through the budget once and will read it again before Monday. Wilson confirmed that a meeting of the disciplinary representatives of the English department was held yesterday about the budget cuts.

The meeting, which the sources described as "bloody," was "a hard-working meeting in which we were trying to solve problems," according to Wilson. When asked to describe the atmosphere of the meeting, Wilson replied, "I'm not going to go into individuals' feelings in the matter. It was a co-operational meeting between disciplinary representatives."

Wilson refused to discuss the budget, but said that he was not proposing drastic cuts in T.A.'s: "I don't want to suggest panic and worry."

SAC didn't back occupiers

By GEORGE COOK

Kate Bishop, Students' Administrative Council (SAC) representative for Innis College, read a statement to SAC general council members Wednesday night criticizing the SAC executive for its "lack of support" for the 12 people who occupied U of T president John Evans' office earlier this week.

Bishop, one of the occupiers, said the statement issued by the SAC executive Monday night "was interpreted as non-support."

Bishop said that Evans told the occupiers they did not have SAC support for their actions. Bishop claimed this weakened the occupiers' ability to press their demands.

The SAC executive in their written statement disclaimed all responsibility for the actions of the 12 people involved.

Bishop and SAC external commissioner John Doherty took part in the occupation.

"Their involvement was the result of individual decisions on their part. SAC did not initiate the plans for the occupation nor did it consider those plans prior to the occupation. The occupation was and is the responsibility of the 12 people involved."

The statement goes on to "essentially endorse the demands of the occupiers." It continued: "It was noted that it was more appropriate to demand that the Governing Council make all efforts to halt cutbacks at the university, rather than the occupiers' demands that the Governing Council unilaterally halt all cutbacks."

Doherty said he felt that "the response of SAC should have been full support."

"When Evans sees a point of weakness he will go after it. When the SAC statement came through we were basically finished," Doherty said.

Bev Smith, another occupier, said she was "embarrassed and ashamed by the executive's response."

"They wouldn't commit themselves to anything but bureaucratic bullshit," she added.

Student Governing Council representative Phil Ryan called for SAC unity. "The day before the most important demonstration in years is no time for these recriminations," he said.

Communications Commissioner Doug Gerhart said he thought that SAC support for the occupation "would have showed that SAC had abandoned the duly constituted ways of dealing with the administration."

The council went on to ratify the executive's decision.

The next to last item on the agenda was a report from the SAC bargaining team concerning a new collective agreement for SAC's unionized employees.

The council ratified an agreement calling for a pay increase of approximately 20 per cent for SAC's unionized workers.

The union will meet on Monday to consider ratification of the agreement. Negotiations have been in progress and the union members have been without a contract since September of last year.

The council also voted to give Radio Varsity about $5,000 to continue operations next year. The money, however, will not be enough to expand radio distribution on campus.

Candidate Allan Pope

Vic student PC hopeful

By JIM EDWARDS

Allan Pope, a Victoria College student in Political Science and Criminology who is "taking a year off," is seeking the nomination as the Progressive Conservative candidate in the federal riding of Spadina.

"As a student I understand our position a hell of a lot better than someone who is, say, 50 years old," Pope said in a recent interview. "If the federal government had not squandered so much money in the last 10 years, there would be no need now for cutbacks in necessary services such as medicine and education. I am hoping that if enough students get turned on to the idea that someone their age is getting into federal politics, we could get enough support to win the nomination."

Pope's biggest concern is government size. He said: "Ten years ago we only had 22 federal departments. Now we have 33 and they are not doing any more good. We ought to eliminate the departments that do not render any real service."

The Progressive Conservative nomination convention takes place March 28.

Perspectives: casse-croûte en français

Depuis le mois de janvier, le collège Victoria a créé une table dans sa salle à manger exclusivement réservée pour la conversation française. Tous ceux qui savent un peu de français viennent chaque mardi et vendredi à midi pour discuter ensemble ou simplement pour écouter les autres parler.

La table à Burwash a déjà existé mais ça fait depuis 1968 qu'elle a servi. On peut remarquer par ce fait que la conversation française est redevenue quelque chose qui évoque l'intérêt chez les étudiants de Victoria. Ainsi, on peut constater aussi l'apparence d'un café-théâtre qui a été établi au début de l'année.

Les discussions en français ont

couvert une énorme variété de sujets. On partage la conversation entre la météorologie, les dissertations qui sont en retard, les examens qui ont été bien reçus (ou qui ont été échoués), la politique française, la politique canado-québécoise, l'histoire, les sciences économiques — enfin tout ce qu'on pourrait imaginer. L'autre jour, il y en avait un qui parlait des élections au collège Victoria, pendant qu'un autre pensait tout haut aux élections fédérales imminentes.

Les gens qui y assistent sont la plus part du temps des étudiants faisant partie du département de français à Victoria, et qui veulent améliorer leurs pouvoirs conversationnels. Par contre, il y en a qui veulent simplement exercer leur talent de bilinguisme et ont tendance à discuter de tout et de rien à la fois.

D'ailleurs, puisque la table se trouve chez les hommes (le collège est toujours divisé) les étudiantes y viennent participer. Parfois on peut trouver des gens de Woodsworth ou de St. Mike's qui apportent leur déjeuner et qui participent également. Les autorités à Burwash n'aiment pas trop le déjeuner apporté d'ailleurs mais ils ont tendance à ne rien dire. Les étudiants en général sont fiers et contents de pouvoir parler en français pendant leur trois-quarts d'heure de repos le midi.

IBM 3032 purchase opposed by professors

By JOHN CAMERON

An "intense, behind-the-scenes debate" is now raging over the purchase of a new computer for U of T, according to U of T Chemistry professor J. P. Valteau.

Valteau, among other Chemistry and Physics professors at U of T, is opposed to the purchase of an IBM 3032 computer which would cost approximately $3 million. Valteau indicated that he would rather see the money left unspent for the time being, until the administration has the opportunity to assess alternative solutions to the problem. When questioned about the alternative solutions, Valteau refused to specifically name any items on which he would like to see money spent.

However, U of T professor and chairman of the Computer Science department, Pat Hume, indicated that Valteau favors the purchase of an IBM 3031 computer in lieu of the 3032. The 3031 is a smaller computer with a price tag of $1.2 million.

According to Hume, U of T needs a new computer because the university has been renting a computer for the university's administrative work since the Sir Sandford Fleming fire last spring.

The rented computer is an emergency solution only, said Hume. A new computer is needed quickly because "they are hoping to reconstruct the interior of that building (Sir Sandford Fleming) and they must get the computer out of there."

In addition, Hume pointed out that because it is very costly to rent a computer, the purchase of the 3032 "costs no more out of the budget than the present payments do, and, in fact, budget costs would drop."

Currently, the university owns an IBM 370-165 which handles academic work. It is proposed that this computer be used for administrative work and that the new computer be used for academic work.

Hume contends that the 3031 is inadequate to handle academic work of the university while Valteau feels that the 3031 can do the job and that "with the number of technological changes occurring in the field of computing, the 3032 is probably not the best investment."

The Chemistry department's proposal to use a mini-computer for their own academic work prompted Hume to state that "the Chemistry and Physics people tend to push things on other people when they get what they want."

Hume feels that speed is important in getting a new computer. The university "could acquire a 3032 by July," according to Hume, "but nobody really knows when the 3031 would be available if at all."

Valteau, on the other hand, stressed that there is "no urgency" and he fears that "it might be possible to provide better services in a more efficient way" than through the purchase of a 3032.

The university's Advisory Committee on Computing, appointed by Governing Council, has the majority of members, including Hume, in favor of the purchase of the 3032. However, Physics professor Samuel Wong and Chemistry professor Michael Dignam stated that the 3032 should not be purchased.

Valteau, who says he is an interested party and not a member of the advisory committee, stated that a "lobbying process" is occurring. Valteau's group meets today with the university administration in order to present their contrary arguments. It is not known when a decision will be forthcoming.

Shcharansky "symbol of freedom," says lawyer

By DAVID YANOWSKI

"Anatoly Shcharansky, in his fight for human rights in the Soviet Union, stands as a symbol not only to Jews but to all mankind. Only if he is free are we all free," said Joseph Pomerant, legal counsel for the Shcharansky family, while addressing a rally in front of Sidney Smith Hall last Wednesday.

The rally, which drew several hundred participants including members of the Shcharansky family, was held to mark the first anniversary of Shcharansky's arrest. At the same time that the rally was going on at U of T there were several hundred similar demonstrations and hunger strikes going on in various parts of the Western world.

The demonstration began with a brief ceremony in memory of the more than 30 Israelis killed by the Palestine Liberation Organization over the weekend. First to speak was Simcha Jacobovici, U of T student and director of Network, the umbrella organization for every Jewish student organization in North America.

Jacobovici began by reminding the participants of the special nature of the Shcharansky affair.

"Unlike most dissidents, he has not been charged with vagrancy, but with treason, a charge that, if he is convicted, carries the death penalty. Even though U.S. President Carter has personally intervened in the case and denied any connection between Shcharansky and the CIA the Soviet authorities still hold to their fabricated charges.

"Even though Canada has said it is willing to have Shcharansky as an immigrant, the Soviets still refuse to let him leave. We are here to show the world, that a society can no longer persecute its Jews and suffer no impunity."

The main speaker of the demonstration was U of T professor Emil Fackenheim, who addressed himself to the clear anti-semitic overtones of the whole affair.

Fackenheim said that in the Soviet Union, "Jews are ipso facto dissidents, because they have dual loyalties. Jews are dissidents and dissidents are Jews. Everyone can have some form of dual loyalty, but not the Jew. Are Ukrainians in the Soviet Union accused of having dual loyalty?"

Fackenheim compared the Shcharansky case to the Dreyfuss incident of the turn of the century. In this case though, Fackenheim went on to say, "the Soviet authorities, hope not only to strike out against Jews, but by singling out the Jewish dissidents, strike a blow against all dissidents. Jewish dissidents only want two things: to be allowed to be Jews within the U.S.S.R. and if not that to be allowed to be Jews in Israel."

Fackenheim next recalled the Beilis trial which took place in 1911. A Jewish man was accused of murdering a Russian boy because he needed the blood for a Jewish ceremony.

"Jews had to refute those charges, as they now have to refute the Nazis that want to march in Skokie, Illinois, and as they must refute the charges against Shcharansky. In the Beilis trial peasants heard the testimony and found Beilis not guilty. At the Shcharansky trial, in this workers' paradise, they will be no peasants to decide on the evidence."

Fackenheim concluded that "the difference between Czarist and Communist Russia is that Czarist Russia openly boasted of being anti-semitic and authoritarian, while Communist Russia makes a pretense to virtue. We must never cease to expose anti-semitism that poses as not being anti-semitism, tyranny that poses as freedom. The fight against the evil beast, anti-semitism, is the fight for humanity."

Abortion clinics attacked

SAN FRANCISCO (NDS-CUP) — The National Abortion Rights Action League (NARAL) says American abortion clinics are being victimized by "the worst politically motivated violence of the decade."

After compiling reports from across the United States, the league found that six clinics were damaged by arson or firebombs during the past year. Others have been vandalized, bombed or riddled with bullets. And in many cases, workers, patients and even children were physically threatened.

In Cleveland, for example, someone posing as a delivery person threw a corrosive chemical into the face of a worker, lit a match and set the building on fire. Before the clinic burned to the ground, several patients, including one who was on the operating table, had to be evacuated.

NARAL spokesperson Karen Mulhouser said she has no idea who has been perpetrating the attacks on abortion clinics.

Tamburitzans: the KISS of folk art?

I once despised folk art with the vigor and dogma of a Mirvish Village Torontonian sermonizing on Buffalo. For me, "Micmac Drumbeats 200" was the Idea of bird course, and the study of Lithuanian panpipes was the ne plus ultra of hokum esoterica.

The Duquesne University Tamburitzans didn't exactly "change all that" (I've been a born-again primitivist for weeks), but they proved to me the value and complexity of a kind of spectacle often ridiculed by us blasé city dwellers. The group staged a variety of Eastern European songs and dances last Friday at Seneca's Minkler Auditorium.

Duquesne U is situated in an industrial suburb of Pittsburgh, and the forty-odd members of the troupe are given scholarships in exchange for their work. Their promo material understandably emphasizes the brilliance and precision of the show, but I found the groundwork of peasant culture at least as engaging as all the tumbling and carrying on.

Recurrent themes manifest themselves quite clearly in the dance routines, and I think the average viewer would see cultural similarities much more quickly than differences. (I take for granted the authenticity of the choreography.) Courtship rituals all emphasized the necessity of a complex and delicate system of communication between sexes, or perhaps more importantly, the inviolability of sexual identity.

One of the most interesting indications of this concern surfaced in the stunning Bulgarian dance that closed the first half of the program. Two independent circles of men and women interlocked by joining hands through the arms of the members of the opposite circle: interpenetration of the sexes seemed complete, but men and women never touched hands. The agitation of the dancers heightened the thrill of the image.

Sexual polarity was ironically underlined in the final Armenian routine, when a company of heavies thundered through a masculine show of agility and power only to find that one of their buddies had been a woman.

I shouldn't portray the Tamburitzans as a stage version of last month's National Geographic. The costumes are very beautiful throughout, and the movement of color is exciting on its own account. It's hard to be interested in the music, though; I certainly don't believe peasants ever strummed 40 Croatian banjos in part harmony.

For me most of fun was in the sexual message of the dances: it's either the cleanest sex in the world or the only clean sex in the world.

Arthur Kaptainis

Unknown Verdi ahead of its time

Many great composers have left a subsidiary legacy of adequate (or better) works which, for varying reasons, have been eclipsed by their more famous counterparts. Stiffelio is such an opera and, although certainly not Verdi's finest achievement, it deserves more recognition than it has received in the past. This was verified Monday evening by the excellent performance of it in the Opera in Concert series.

Chronologically, Stiffelio immediately precedes Rigoletto, Il Trovatore and La Traviata. If that were not enough to ensure its later obscurity, it also ran into difficulties with the censors of 1850 who wished to minimize the religious element and, consequently, robbed many scenes of their dramatic intensity. Finally, there is no central romantic plot, but rather a deliberation on the morality of a previous adulterous affair. All these elements encouraged the nineteenth-century audience to pass over this opera in favour of Verdi's subsequent works, even prompting the composer to rewrite it twice. However, there are many satisfying melodies to recommend the work, and the decrease in recitative-aria polarity points the way to later developments in Verdi's output.

Briefly, the story concerns a minister,

Stiffelio, who returns from a mission only to discover that his wife, Lina, has had an affair with a young nobleman, Raffaele. Stankar, Lina's father, is determined to save the honour of his family and challenges Raffaele to a duel, from which Stankar emerges victorious. In the meantime, Lina has confessed to Stiffelio, pleading above all that she still loves her husband. In the final scene, the bewildered Stiffelio finds support in his Christian morality and publicly forgives his wife in the course of his sermon.

This happy ending is relatively unique in Verdi's opera plots and is well removed from the heart-rending stories of his more popular works. Clearly, the censors' removal of the inner religious conflict would have left little to arouse an audience's interest, let alone compassion. The division of parts is also unusual, with Stiffelio's role being very reserved and the main interest focused on Lina and her father. Raffaele is virtually a nonentity, for whom the audience can feel nothing when he is slain, and two characters, Federico and Dorotea, are included for no apparent reason, dramatically or musically.

Using the original, uncensored version and assisted by Richard Fisher's copious program notes, the singers Monday night were able to impart a remarkable amount of drama to their presentation. Joel Katz, as Jorg, Stiffelio's fellow minister, opened the production with tremendous effect although he appeared but rarely as the opera progressed. Clinging the night for the basses was the outstanding performance of Guillermo Silva-Marín as Stankar, who was given considerable scope for his rich voice in the two duets with Lina.

Lina was capably handled by Nancy Hermiston, whose rather thin voice was ideal for the delicate character she portrayed. Her phrasing was extremely musical, more than making up for some of her weaker low notes.

As previously mentioned, the roles of Raffaele, Federico and Dorotea, sung by Mark Dubois, Michael Shust and Janet Coates respectively, are two slight to be given proper consideration. Unfortunately, the title role, as performed by Paul Frey, did not measure up to those of Lina or Stankar, revealing frequent pitch problems and inconsistent tone production. Overall, however, the production was a gratifying one, with the father-daughter music showing Verdi in as fine a form as we are likely to find anywhere in his works.

In Pursuit of Coleridge: life as a searcher & researcher

Behind the quiet vistas of scholarship often lie the troubled lives of tormented individuals; but in the case of Kathleen Coburn, judging by her recently released memoir In Pursuit of Coleridge, it seems that life was always fortuitous and to some extent comfortable. The illusion may be false; Miss Coburn writes with a reticence rarely found in autobiography in this decade. Her heartstrings, if she had any, are not depicted working themselves out in fleshy encounters nor do her politics appear to have caused her much discomfort. It is an eminently restrained life into which we are introduced.

Coburn's name has come to be associated so closely with the great writer that the book draws its attractiveness principally from the possible further revelations of Coleridge's character, reflected from the poly-angular mind of Coburn, who chose to comprehend him when most were dismissing his wide range of talents as a mere dissipation of intellect.

The tale of Coburn's growing fascination with Coleridge is described within the dual framework of life in a scholarly environment and its constraints, and her growing intimacy with the poet's descendants. To anyone who has harboured fantasies of manuscript discoveries, her book will resemble Aladdin's Lamp. On every page is a discovery, each more fortuitous than the last.

It is the story of search and research which makes the book so compelling. The other side of Coburn's life, her rural upbringing and her abiding love of the raw country of lake-speckled Ontario, is less than profound, though it may well have determined her approaches to life. In this book, it seems rather the reader's indulgence in his favourite writer's aberrations — a thing to be weighed, and then endured out of mere courtesy and not due to any special insight.

The inside machinations of the publishing trade — both scholarly and commercial — are neatly detailed amidst tales of chicanery intended to preserve manuscripts from the depredations of private collectors and the stupidity of great institutions. The British Museum or Victoria College? Which should have Coleridge's memorabilia and literary remains? To members of the university the book is of greater interest.

There are insightful vignettes of other famous men and women. Coburn has a good ear for conversations, a shrewd eye, and an apt summary for each of those she describes: de la Mare, Margaret Murray, I.A. Richards, among others.

This is by no means a revolutionary book, the sort of thing a publishing house bruits about with a fanfare of ingratiating pre-paid puffery from the 'critics'. It is, though, of great interest to those who study Coleridge, if only to show something of the mental workings of his rescuer from literary oblivion. In itself, the life of Kathleen Coburn has been self-rewarding, deserving of approbation; and then, morbidly, a restful silence. She is much aware of death in this book, and her best observations are on that subject. It is a good memoir, a good read, and fascinating, in an easy and educated style.

Anti-Bruckner terrorists strike

Hart House Chorus really bit off more than it could chew (or more correctly, sing) for its program on Sunday evening. An anxiety-filled interpretation of Pergolesi's Stabat Mater, which managed to miss most of the work's subtleties, was presented by the sopranos and altos in the first half of the concert. Conductor Denise Narcisse-Mair could (and should) have done much more with the musical phrasings, aiming towards more variety and greater fluidity.

Instead, the rhyming structure of the text was made painfully obvious by consistent over-emphasis of final syllables and a lack of feeling for any larger forms. Although Garth Lambert provided solid accompaniment at the piano, soloists frequently dragged behind the tempo and the choir generally sounded unsure rhythmically.

A few charming voices were heard in solos, notably Nancy Kim and Anne Sorensen, but overall the soloists' nervousness was so apparent that it was impossible to sit back and enjoy listening to the music. It was certainly brave of the choir to attempt the Pergolesi, but much greater refinement is required, both in conducting and in singing, before this work can be mastered.

The visual presentation of the entire program could have been greatly enhanced with a few words in rehearsal from the conductor. With that many singers on stage, an attempt to control the violent arm-flapping cum time-beating with the music folders is simple enough to enforce and allows the audience a more enjoyable performance.

The fairly obvious and bombastic writing in Bruckner's E Minor Mass was considerably more suited to this group. The full choir was joined by a wind orchestra, producing some truly wonderful sounds in the first three movements. The opening of the Kyrie was well focused and it seemed the concentration, so sadly lacking in the Pergolesi, had finally surfaced. However, fate was evidently against the chorus that night, for the fire alarm went off during the Gloria, eventually bringing the performance to a halt by its annoying insistence.

Resuming after this 'pause', the choir was able to maintain the momentum of the opening. The "Credo" proved the most successful movement, revealing marvelous control in "Et incarnatus est" and in "sepultus est". However, the choir began to falter in the last two movements, and the Benedictus sounded harsh while tuning problems plagued the Agnus Dei. In general, the chorus needed more time, thoughtful planning and precise direction in order to produce noteworthy performances of these pieces.

Russian culture festival

Last Friday night was an eye-opener for many members of the audience who attended a festival celebrating Russian culture. The evening, held at Bickford Park High School, was sponsored by The Russian Cultural Circle and The Centre for Russian and East European Studies of the University of Toronto.

For those unacquainted with Russian character dance, the evening was truly a revelation. The students of the Russian School of Folk Dance showed remarkable stage presence and ability to deal with difficult technique considering their youth. "Potatoes", a charming Beylorussian dance was confidently performed by the youngest members of the school who were little more than infants. Of the dances presented by the senior members of the school, the most memorable to my mind was the "Ural Quadrille". It was lovely and precisely executed.

However, the climax of the evening were the numbers performed by the Ivushka Dance Ensemble. The finest tradition of Russian character dance was passed down to these dancers by Elena Zhuravleva, a former dancer of the famed Moiseyev Dance Ensemble. The Technical ability of this group was something to admire. At one moment, the dancers were bearing down upon us with the thundering staccato of complex, vibrant choreography, only to float away in the next with the softest of lyrical movements.

Ivushka's first dance was a humorous picture of village life full of coquetry and fun. It revolved around six peasant girls smitten with one cocky, flirtatious lad. Each girl, in vying for his attention, offered virtuoso technique ranging from mad, whirling spins to seductive glides. In the end, the girls band together in a series of flawlessly co-ordinated steps reminiscent of the "Dance of the Little Swans".

In contrast, Ivushka's "Dance of the Kerchief" was poetry in motion. The kaleidoscope of colours and patterns was truly an aesthetic experience. The elegant poses of the dancers revealed Zhuravleva's emphasis on ballet training.

Although the evening was an exciting blend of music, poetry and dance, Ivushka's artistry was the most impressive. The enthusiasm of the audience showed the enormous potential this type of art form has.

Dracula subverts melodrama

The blood is streaming, the voices of birth-strangled babes are howling and the audience laughs at most unexpected moments in this Toronto Free Theatre production of The Brides of Dracula. The play is equipped with all the accoutrements of its kind and the result is predictable. The reviewer must admit that his back felt like an anthill more than once.

Young English guests arrive in a Hungarian castle welcomed by a virtuoso piano-player, the servant Igor, who can cook only chicken paprikas. Sure enough, Dracula is the host and he starts biting into every woman in sight as well as into some men. A mental athlete, Dr. Van Helsing, makes an impressive appearance in the middle of the play with seemingly inexhaustible supplies of garlic, vervain and firearms, but even he is far from having the situation at his finger-tips. Of course I won't tell you what happened in the end.

The play is a traditional melodrama, but you can see how painstakingly the producers worked to infiltrate, subvert and lay waste the form and the figure of this old genre.

Here the vampire-hunters discuss with undue relish the methods of slaughtering a big-mouthed girl, there Dracula returns the accusations exposing him as having done something immoral (i.e. drink blood) with a perfunctory "so have the lawyers."

Dracula is, by the way, played by a female actor Chapelle Jaffe, not that it really matters: taking seriously the tradition of a male playing a vampire would imply taking seriously the whole tradition of a vampire play. William Lane explained to us that he really did not intend to give the role of Dracula to a female qua female, but rather he gave the role to Chapelle Jaffe qua Chapelle Jaffe. It worked well: Jaffe gave her performance with plenty of energy and sometimes humour.

The drama and the melodrama are quite distinct. The latter seems to contain some inherent flaw that keeps it forever in a position of a scullery-maid of theatre. Lane redeemed the melodrama with an admixture of comedy. He left the impression, that he used humour as a sort of anagnorisis counterpoint for the elaborate horror effects.

The sets for the play are quite remarkable with a great variety of special effects.

The actors present us with an even and comprehensive performance. George Dawson (Igor) was enjoyable in a cameo role and David Bolt, as Van Helsing controlled the play's pacing. On some nights the actors and the producers give the audience a chance of joint discussion on the play during an informal coffee break after the end of the play. Phone the theatre if interested (368-2856).

The worst of both worlds

THE SPIRAL STAIR by John Bentley Mays. Coach House Press, $6.95 cloth.

A new government has come into power over much of the world; a government which utilizes the most oppressive elements of the Byzantine, the Catholic and the Bolshevik. It is a government based on mysticism, anti-capitalism, sexual libertinism, all as a means of abasing the body and uplifting the soul, and to the total enslavement of the masses under a powerful, cynical elite.

Perhaps the key metaphor of this novel is the festival of the acitorite, St. Superbia, who had a vision at the age of four in which she was commanded by Father Time to cut off her clitoris, and "to keep it in a jar of formaldehyde until our kindly parish priest came, and took it away and gave it to our beloved and Most Holy Patriarch, so that the Patriarch might ... show it to all the faithful. ... So I did the deed with a humble appreciator."

Every year a festival is held in honor of the acitorite on her Saint's Day, and an hysteria is created in a crowd in which thousands of women and girls perform the same operation with the same instrument (St. Superbia died doing this — how many of the women at the Festivals do so as well is difficult to estimate or determine). That mystical, hysterical festival is a finely poetic image for the basic mechanism by which a totalitarian regime prospers; a combination of mystification and revelry keeps the people in line, keeps them in such a state of frenzy and self-division that revolt — even a proper comprehension of their oppression — is impossible.

RITUALS BOND RULERS

But — and this is the subtlety of the book — the ruling elite is, in differing ways, as bound by the set-up of ritual, festival, and hysteria, as the masses they keep in bondage. They all have varying degrees of unbelief and cynicism, but are nevertheless bound to a certain admiration of the devotional spirit which infuses the society's savage rituals. Everyone sits somewhere on the winding, confused, spiral stair of brutalities, violations, mystifications.

Perhaps no writer since Kafka has created so perfectly a logical fantastic universe for the isolation and comprehension of the component elements of a totalitarian state, as John Bentley Mays has in The Spiral Stair. Coach House Press is to be commended for publishing Mays' extraordinary novel.

The only major quarrel I have with the book is with the two long passages at the opening and close. Each is a long seamless paragraph with sentences connected by dots. The trouble is that the writing here is seamless as well; smooth-flowing and incantatory to be sure, but without purpose or direction. This is in very marked contrast to the boldness and force which characterizes the remainder.

Martin Heavisides

Grappelli's perfect, but he's no KISS

There's nothing harder than trying to write a review of a really good concert. Inevitably you are left mouthing platitudes and throwing out the usual string of saccharine adjectives. In the end, you sound like a publicity blurb or the liner notes for an Arthur Hailey paperback. So tell me, what do you do with a perfect concert?

Stephane Grappelli has had a long and incredibly varied career. This sixtyish jazz violinist from Paris has played with all the traditional greats and no small number of modern maniacs. He is controlled, lyrical, inventive, fast and every other adjective you can think of that applies to a jazz master. So when he comes to the Massey Hall, as he did last Sunday, barring a stroke, you can rest assured that he will put on an almost letter perfect concert.

Well he didn't have a stroke last Sunday and, you guessed it, the concert was almost letter perfect. The Diz Disley Trio, who backed him up, featured two dazzling guitarists and a very proficient bass player. They managed to shine without stealing the limelight from Grappelli. Together they ran through the bulk of Grappelli's standards, such as "Satin Doll", "Blurred Moon", "I Got Rhythm." Also introduced into the program were "As Time Goes By" and a piece that Grappelli originally did with Jean Luc Ponty.

The surprise of the evening came when the band left the stage and Disley sat down at the piano. Now he's no Oscar Peterson, and his rhythm shifts tended to be a little arbitrary, but he played the instrument with more proficiency and understanding than half the "keyboard whiz-kids" that one finds stumbling around today. Genius at one instrument is impressive, at two, it's unforgettable.

So that's it. It was as near a perfect concert as one is likely to see in this city and as I don't like reviewing good concerts, I'm leaving this baby to someone else. So there.

Schafer offers severed head and more

The first presentation at the New Music Concert Series this week was La Testa D'Adriane (1978) by R. Murray Schafer.

This is a stage drama about a woman whose head has been saved just a moment before suicide. It can only come to life with music.

Soprano Mary Morrison's severed head appeared floating over a round table on stage and the sorcerer-musician who brought her to life was free bass accordionist Joseph Macerollo.

Macerollo seemed to melt into his role, conveying by turns mystery, playfulness and eeriness. Morrison was more than adequate even as a severed head. She looked evil and hissed and spat hysterically and frequently flicked her tongue furiously up and down like a rattlesnake as she closed and opened her eyes rapidly.

La Testa D'Adriane was a novel way to present many sounds together (accordion, singing, and spoken word) while providing visual stimulation with macabre theatrics. It was an interesting piece marred by howling that was almost loud enough to permanently damage the ear drums. It's a wonder that Mary Morrison allows her golden voice to be put to such use.

The mood and mystery on stage were spoiled by lights that were too bright throughout the performance, by a table-top that was the same colour as her hair (her skin providing poor contrast), and by a curtain that was too gaudy. The one piece in the middle, meant to represent a kiosk, was not convincing.

The work was well received by the startled audience, which howled, laughed and gasped at the antics on stage.

EFFECTIVE APPROACH

The second work was Interplay

(1972) by Barbara Pentland, performed by Macerollo with the members of the Purcell String Quartet.

Some moments were just a bit hackneyed, but they worked. Boasting a rondo, some contrapuntal textures and several variations, the work was overall exciting, mysterious and alive and presented an effective approach to writing for accordion and string quartet.

The scandal and star of the evening was Schafer's Loving (1963-65). The piece was so long (about 1½ hours) and so loud that some of its last 45 minutes were unbearable. Still, it stood out at the end as a work with moments of brilliance and powerful originality.

Loving is an ambiguous drama about love between the sexes, with the emphasis on what a sweet fellow the hero is to put up with and to seek to understand such crazy ladies. The play really has an air of self-justification on the part of the male.

Two characters, He, played by Gilles Savard, and She, played by Trulie MacLeod, are recollecting their love, or confronting one another. Four sides of She are presented by four singers representing Modesty, Ishtar (goddess of love), Vanity and Eros.

PAUCITY OF IDEAS

The composer claims to present words purely as musical sounds.

Unfortunately the languages he has chosen are French and English. Not only are they all too easy to understand, the paucity of ideas they present is embarrassing: "I am afraid", "we talked so we could avoid saying anything", and "oh no, that's not the way it was" etc.

The four singers presented their "poses" very well. Kathy Terrell was an eye opening Eros. Mary Lou Fallis was a suitable Modesty, and her gorgeous voice was a standout in a small part. Jean MacPhail was a most convincing Vanity and Susan Gudgeon as Ishtar the love goddess was outstanding.

As a sex symbol, Gudgeon avoided the obvious and instead combined sweet wide-eyed abandon with lust, and managed to portray this even when at rest. When she danced, she displayed a fire and energy that held the audience in thrall.

Trulie MacLeod with narrowed eyes and pursed mouth convincingly sustained a mood of petty, dissatisfied meanness.

It is difficult to believe though that Savard could possibly arouse such emotions. As the five ladies around him showed a rainbow of emotions, he looked at all times tender, gentle, neat and kind, and with all the emotional range of a catatonic schizophrenic.

But the full rich timbre of his voice as he spoke French added tremendously to the texture of the sound fabric.

Cdn. composer R. Murray Schafer

The prize for acting must surely go to members of the Purcell String Quartet who kept immobile faces as Ishtar the sex symbol — braless and dressed in red and black — opened her legs draped one around the nearest string player's body, and rubbed herself frequently against him.

The first half of Loving was marvellous. The musical quality of the voices, the sounds of the instruments and the tapes of the voices all combined together in a series of wonderful effects, from sensual whispering at the opening, to very soft sounds, to very light and delicate instrumentation. Then we seemed to pass from the composer's dreams or from the period of being in love, to the nightmares or the period of recrimination and hostilities.

The areas of boredom in the second half, mainly caused by the length, could have been endured, had the pain not been compounded by a most ridiculous unleashing of noise, with singers screaming at the top of their lungs and percussionists banging on the drums with all their might, in the medium size MacMillan Theatre.

The Night drags on...

The abortive Children of Night examines Warsaw ghetto life of the early forties, centering on the fate of some 200 children under their Nazi oppressors. The dramatic conflicts are sketchy and the play drags too often. The Nephesh Theatre Company is struggling to keep the production running at the Bathurst Street Theatre, but less than receptive audiences are challenging their efforts.

I am not sure who to blame more, director Howard Rypp for his tired return to a sixties style (ho hum) or playwright Gabriel Emmanuel who failed to give me anything I could take hold of. The theme has dramatic potential, but in the hands of these two men it rapidly disintegrates.

One thing is certain: the production is topical. John Juliani, the principal character, is guaranteed to give a public statement at the end of the show, attacking whoever happens to be bothering him the most that day.

A group of actors called The Core supplied some arresting moments in ensemble work, but they were hardly innovative. In their attempt to work off the audience they violated my space and gave most everyone a headache. E. M. Margolese and Juliani spoke directly to the audience and began to develop a rapport, but The Core disturbed that intimacy and tended to offend me.

The children's collective performance bore many rough edges. I became at least tolerant of their presence when the technical demands upon them were relaxed. This happened in the second act only because it was expressly written for the children alone.

Larry Laffen's set design gave a stark impressionist image of the Warsaw ghetto, but failed to convey any sense of tension. The lighting and sound was disturbing, as I am sure it was intended to be, but Dan Tulloch created a system that was too often distracting. It didn't enhance the production value at all.

It was the unfortunate selection of the material that held the Nephesh production down. The occasional strengths simply could not be drawn together. If Rypp finds his way out of the sixties perhaps he will produce some very exciting work.

Zen and the art of locomotive maintenance

Tom O'Hanley is responsible for the sadly obscure play Suddenly Open Windows; suddenly instant boredom. I will not forgive O'Hanley for offending me three times: in writing the script, then by having the nerve to put it into production and lastly starring in one of its major roles. O'Hanley is spreading himself thin and not doing it well.

Cyclos Theatre Co. is staging this production at the Unlimited Space, former home of Theatre Du P'tit Bonheur. Last year when P'tit Bonheur vacated the space it was not closed down, and that's a shame. It is a shoddy theatre, 'dirty' and full of distractions (the creaking floor is criminal); I sympathize with anyone who has to perform or spectate under such conditions.

In the play, a family acts out a bizarre charade in a railway station, exposing everyone's frailties, and then take turns seducing a transient youth. The mother of this group masquerades as a cleaning lady, but is revealed as a whore and at the end of the play she leaves to write a script for All My Children. Well, not really, although it would explain some of the motivation for this otherwise pointless drama.

The language of the play is terribly confusing delivering philosophical tones of an esoteric nature (Zen and The Art of Locomotive Maintenance). If the actors took the time to analyse the script they would see how incredibly unconnected the speeches are.

The characters are all one-dimensional figures and the actors were not able to do much of anything with their interpretations. The cast moves across the stage in a mechanical and contrived manner that is very noticeable and evocative of bad direction. I suspect that William Colgate's performance would be just as painful no matter what play he was acting in.

The play is an aggravating experience and presents characters that no one could identify with, simply because they are so stereo typically drawn. Beneath these pathetic characters there is a clue to what and why they are on stage. The theme, however, is so poorly developed I doubt it would be worthwhile finding out.

The entire audience left the production as confused and disappointed as I was. One thing is clear: the play leaves you wishing there were open windows because it was awfully stale.

An Unmarried Woman: Lady doesn't sing the blues

Hats off to Paul Mazursky, the multi-faceted film-maker who wrote, directed and produced the sophisticated new comedy-drama An Unmarried Woman. He manages to transform one of the most widespread, snicker-provoking clichés of our society into a palatable, believable form, void of archetypes.

Jill Clayburgh, as Erica, portrays an upper middle class New York woman who feels secure in her marriage to Martin, her fortyish Wall Street stock broker husband of 17 years (played by Michael Murphy). She is then dumb-founded by the reality that hubby has found a "younger woman". She is left with a 15-year-old non-nonsense daughter, Patty, and a part time job at an art gallery. The story could have stopped here had Erica been made from the uncomplicated model of the vulnerable woman who sets off in search of another on whom she can be emotionally and financially dependent. This, however, is not your typical melodrama, for although we see Erica suffer from the pains of loneliness and feelings of exploitation common in such situations, we find in her the potential for growth and maturation as a result of the experience.

Eventually constructive steps lead her to discover an alternative lifestyle. Her therapist convinces her that the best treatment for someone who has "fallen off a horse" is to hop right back on. Back to dating. "Oh no!" she thinks "not that!" But she knows she must. Erica is unique in that, in middle-age, she can still boast of having three close girlfriends and an intense mother-daughter relationship to see her through the crisis. Along the way she attempts to separate her sexual from her emotional self in a one night fling with Charlie, a macho artist and a short-term guy who loves 'em and leaves 'em and is brazen about it too. This is a ticket to emptiness for her.

Finally Saul (Alan Bates), yet another artist, comes along. While he starts out being just another one of her bedtime stories, he winds up as her serious lover and a pleasant alternative to males of her past. He wants a proper relationship with Erica, which does not include the need to possess or dominate her. The movie ends on the entirely optimistic note that a woman can hold on to her individuality and hold onto a man without either entity having to make concessions.

Something particularly noteworthy in this film is the fact that Mazursky shows weakness in his male characters. It is the male who is rendered a helpless, pathetic figure, as best exemplified by Martin. He's a decent man caught up in an affair and is, at one point, beset by guilt knowing he has wronged his wife. Mazursky shows Martin crying during his confession to his wife and completely reversing the classic goodbye scene. What would Gable or Bogie have thought of a man who didn't have guts enough to say

"frankly my dear I don't give a damn" or "so long sweetheart!"

An Unmarried Woman is a refreshing and welcomed change of pace. We finally get a woman's point of view. Which is funny, as it's written by a man.

Deborah Blackstone

art

In Yorkville, big Wally Ballach's paintings can be seen at the Gadatsy Gallery. From the look of the specimen of the work we received, the man is blind. Opening Saturday at the Isaacs Gallery, William Kurelek, author of Lumberjack, is putting on a show. Looks like prime time Canadian content.

It really seems that all hell is being let loose this Saturday in the art world. Yes, another opening. This time it's at the David Mirvish Gallery and the man in question is Michael Steiner. From our promo pic., he looks like any other funny little man with glasses, but rumour has it that he may be the next Andy Warhol.

And now, shows in progress. An exhibition of dolls at A.G.O.'s Grange Gallery. Elsewhere at the A.G.O., there are works by Melvin Charney, photos by the grand old duke himself, Ed Muybridge and works by Eskimos and Indians. At the R.O.M. catch the nifty Polish embroidery show, plus Chinese fan painting, and some Celtic artifacts.

Hart House still has its collection of Anna Myers and Lena Endicott. It's worth catching.

Things to watch out for. The Stong Show at Stong College. Dan Maloney. And finally Gershon Iskowitz coming soon at Gallery Moos. That's it then; see you on Saturday.

rock

Stop the presses. The immortal Stingaree is playing the Nick next week. No, seriously. This is the band that brought new meaning to the word hyperstatic. They've been compared to everything from a tarpit to a crankshaft. A must see.

But back in the land of the living, Jimbo Buffet is playing the Gardens tonight. Good luck fella. Gorpo Lightfoot is moving into Massey Hall next week to start a six day stint. He is at present installing a swimming pool. Then Triumph brings banality to a new volume when they do their stint with Mox and (gasp) the Guest Who on the 21st at the Gardens. Not to be outdone, Renascence, yet another of those medieval-minded monsters, takes on Massey Hall on the 30th. Great. On the 2nd of April, Maria Muldaur slides into Con Hall. That should be good for a few straightened ties. Then of' slowmo himself, Eric Clapton tumbles into the Gardens on the 9th. Someone call me when he wakes up. Now if you want a concert's concert, catch the zany, madcap Tubes at the Gardens on the 12th. Hilarity runs rampant as suburban psyches wreak havoc. Zon (chuckle) and the amazing, sexy, 'I luv your body.' Carol Pope will be opening. Finally, on the 4th of May, Journey will bring their famous blender impersonation to the Hall.

But let's stop talking shop and start talking rumours. A little bird has it that David Bowie is negotiating for the Gardens for sometime in May. Let's hope he brings the infamous Brian Eno. And Kim informed me that Lou Reed has a new eight man band that features Don Cherry. Amazing.

On the pub circuit, it's hardly worth the crawl. Wayne "King of Blue-eyed Bore" Cochran is still at the El Mo. Howlin' Wolf is playing downstairs. At the Colonial, it's the Silver Tractors, minus Murray. At the Gasworks it's Hurricane Hanna and at the Chimney it's the Hunt. The Beverly has Johnny Razor and the G Rays (give me a break), at the Horseshoe it's Amos Garret (Sun Ra next week), at the Knob it's Saga, at Larry's Hideaway it's Harlequin, the Cuckoo has Jay Smith, the Nickelodeon has Captain (they're no Stingaree), the Tube has Nightwings, the Queensbury Arms has the Dutch Mason Blues Band, the Groaning Board has Bob Carpenter (it couldn't be), the Fingerboard has John Salvy and the J House has Dock Savage.

movies

Tonight: A short week, a short watsup. All the theatres in town seem to be switching over to a policy of screening bad movies for the longest time without announcing either their auspicious commencement or their ignominious conclusion. As a result I entirely missed out on euphuising over that pair of monuments to contemporary landmarks in the music of high culture White Rock and Genesis In Concert. It was billed as senthesia or something and it lived right up. Unfortunately it's gone, leaving trails of tears behind it, and in its wake we find that the New Yorker has exhumed the Grateful Dead for a week in the daylight. Let's hope they don't breed maggots. Meanwhile the Revue is still showing 1900 and the U of T Film Social and After Hours Club has gone continental with Wertmuller's Love and Anarchy (from the scorching Matthew Arnold essay of the same name) and Fellini's Amarcord. The usual U of T double bill has slipped over to Cinema Lumiere where Dr. Strangelove and The Front have found a foster home. And, in expression of all of our feelings about the situation the Science Centre has When Tomorrow Comes.

Saturday: Cinema Lumiere shows the only creativity in town and shows the only film, Children of Paradise, which repeats on Sunday.

Sunday: The American melodramas continue at AGO with The Cobweb and Written on the Wind. These two are so obscure that they don't even have TV Week star ratings. And, for those of us who are having difficulty finishing our essays, Innis has the model, when in doubt send in the chariots. Yessir it's the original Ben Hur, the one without those forgettable subtle touches of Gore Vidal which limp the wrists of the remakes. On the other hand the rest of the program celebrates early films about homosexuality: Salome, which is a special tribute to the god of the epigram Oscar Wilde, Lot in Sodom which was apparently produced by a pair of professional opium addicts, and Behind the Screen, an early Chaplin film which was banned in Götterburg for its approving treatment of those horrible degenerate sodomistic waylayers of young boys. Trust those clean Swedes.

Monday: Lumiere is busy saving the whales and tossing dried soy beans around with its Spring Solstice Celebration For Greenpeace. It's formal so wear your furs.

Tuesday: Lumiere returns to real life, or what Eric Rohmer thinks is real life. If Clare's Knee is like your life you should get help quickly. On the other half of the program, however, is Godard's Masculin-Feminin. If that one feels like home you need help too, but you're in quite a line-up. The Science Centre has a classic about the trials and tribulations of a semi-pro astrologer with a blind-spot. A Star Is Lost. Otherwise the world doesn't move much.

P.S. Would any and everyone who has written for this department this year get in touch sometime before the end of the year, especially if you intend to write next year. I'd like to get together a list to bequeath to my successor. In short Madeleine, Christine, Michel, Car 54, where are you?

jazz

Hello Jazz Fans! I have more information this week about the Sonny Greenwich concert this Sunday at the Colonial Tavern. As you may know, Sonny toured the States with saxophonist John Handy in '67, did a stint with Miles Davis, and since then has turned down invitations to join Elvin Jones and Weather Report. He's playing his own music now; his guitar work has been heavily influenced by John Coltrane. The Colonial will hold two shows, at 2:30 and 7:30 p.m. The rhythm section will feature Don Thompson, Claude Ranger and Gene Perla. Call 923-3771 for information.

The Horseshoe Tavern has come under the new management of Gary Topp, former manager of the New Yorker. A confirmed jazz fan, he's bringing in a series of the giant names in free jazz. On Wednesday, March 22 to Friday March 25, Sun Ra and his Sound Sculpture will perform. This group has pioneered the successful application of free jazz concepts to a big band context. Leave your ears wide open for this one. March 29-31 features the Carla Bley Big Band. Give this club your support.

Guitarist Bamey Kemel continues at Bourbon St. until March 25. At George's, the Bruce Cassidy Quartet (trumpet) gives way on Monday for the Joe Sealy Quartet.

Cafe Soho presents violinist Terry King after hours tonight and tomorrow. Sunday at 2:30 p.m. the Frank Falco Trio perform what seems to have become their regular gig.

Monday at the Science Centre will feature, as the last in a series of free concerts, the CJRT Trombone Workshop: four trombonists plus a rhythm section. Kal Winding created some wonderful effects in the fifties with this instrumentation; the judicious use of mutes lends color and variety where one would otherwise expect mere monotonous trombosity.

Hart House offers the middle of the road music of the Bruce Styles Trio on Wednesday at noon.

Tonight at the Eaton Centre: the Phil Nimmons Quartet, Phil is a clarinetist who leads his own big band as well as the swinging U of T Jazz Ensemble.

The Alvin Pall Quintet (sax) improvise tomorrow at 3 p.m. at the Sutton Place. Way Down and Dave Young do the same at 2:30 p.m. at the Inn on the Park.

Dixie: Harborfront presents the Bob Deangels Band at 7:30 p.m. The Louislana Joymakers heat up the KCR weeknights Tuesday through Saturday at 9 p.m. Corner of Bloor and Avenue Rd.

Three events of interest on Sunday. In the MacMillan Theatre at three, Melvin Bernam conducts the U of T Wind Symphony in some American numbers and the Coronation Scene from Boris Godounov. Free admission. At eight, guitarist Liona Boyd performs solo numbers and the Rodrigo concerto with the CJRT Orchestra in Ryerson Theatre. Orchestral complement is Mendelssohn's Third. At 7:30 in the St. Lawrence Centre, the W. German Confronto Quartet (love that name!) plays Stockhausen selections. Two bucks for students.

First, an apology. Last week I commended actress Valerie Takazauckas for her work in Sexual Perversity In Chicago. I don't take back the praise, just want instead to give it to Valerie Warburton. And add a small compliment to director Takazauckas, imported for the run here. Incidentally, author David Mamet will be a part of the next TAP season, which includes as well new work by Gwendolyn MacEwen, Carol Bolt, and Erika Ritter.

And while we're on the subject of upcoming seasons, it seems that Hart House will investigate the Victorians next year. At Stratford, an immense season is coming up: fifteen staged productions. Four Shakespeare, a Chekhov, another cashbox Noel Coward, and new Canadian writing: from Tom Cone, Sheldon Rosen, and two from Larry Fineberg. Hot damn.

It's not strictly theatre, but Babar, The Little Elephant, has always been a favourite and in a production by the Toronto Dance Theatre might be entertaining. Call 366-7723.

Closing tomorrow, The Island, Athol Fugard's play about life on Robben Island. At Toronto Workshop, 12 Alexander St., call 925-8640, shows at 8:30. Also closing soon, though not willingly, is Children of Night, at the Bathurst St. Theatre. Perhaps the most interesting feature of the performance is a near-nightly harangue by cast member John Juliani against critics and others who have condemned the dramatic concept of the show. Call 536-6663. Also closing this weekend is Suddenly Open Windows, a new creation, and a new company, put together by Tom O'Hanley and the Cyclos Theatre. Panned by Varsity's acidulous Jerry Wallace inside this week's Review, it bravely carries on until Sunday at the Unlimited Space, call 461-6551.

Continuing, The Diary of Anne Frank at Young People's Theatre, call 363-5131 (for optimists), Sexual Perversity in Chicago at New Theatre, 736 Bathurst, call 534-1101 (realists) and Mother Courage, which closes tomorrow night, at TAP, box office number is 366-1656.

New in town, and welcome, is For Colored Gids Who Have Considered Suicide-When The Rainbow Is Enuf at the Alex. Call 363-2411. Out at Playhouse 66, the Scarborough Theatre Guild produces Oh, What A Lovely War, call 751-6509 for pricing on weekend shows. Theatre du P'tit Bonheur presents Quatre a Quatre piece de Michel Garneau starring Viola Leger. At St. Paul's Centre, 121 Avenue Road for the next two weeks. Tickets from $4; call 363-4129. At St. Vlad's, a puppet show at 601 Spadina Avenue, folk tales in Ukrainian and English. $1 for young fry, double that if you've lost your sense of wonder. Call 923-3318 for more information. Saturday and Sunday only.

Opening at the O'Keefe on the 20th is Annie, based on the morality play in strip form of Lil Orphan Annie. Hmnnnn... At the Phoenix, Joe Orton's excellent comedy Loot grosses out audiences as of Tuesday; Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday will cost you $2, and will be more later. Call 922-7835 or 390 Dupont. And Armenic and Old Lace continues at the Bayview Playhouse; call 481-6191.

Return of the Twilight Zone

True aficionados of science-fiction rightfully mourned the untimely death of writer Rod Serling. After all, it was his brilliant Twilight Zone TV series which laid the groundwork for SF's current phenomenal domination of modern popular culture by bringing it to a large weekly audience. His virtue as a writer lay in his ability to weave tales of mass appeal simplicity while packing a one-two punch of social commentary and keen observations of human nature.

The show's daringly mature approach to SF gave added momentum to the trend towards a higher intellectual level in such writing. Sadly though, and as is usually the case, the mind has been emphasized at the expense of the heart. And so it has happened that the magic, the indefinable quality of whimsy that is the essence of SF has become a defunct element in these stories.

Thankfully though, nothing remains static, least of all SF writing which seems to be now coming around full circle. Leading the pack is Spider Robinson, whose book Calahan's Cross-time Saloon seems to place him front and centre as Serling's heir apparent.

The book consists of a series of vignettes set in Callahan's Place, the bar of everyone's dreams (and a place that the book's fans have searched vainly for). Its jovial atmosphere and high-spirited camaraderie make it the kind of corner saloon we need to "get away from it all".

Bit by bit we discover that each of Callahan's patrons is in his own way troubled and has inexplicably gravitated there seeking solutions and ultimately, salvation. You've got problems? Essays overdue? Exam dates looming? Low on beer money? What about Mickey Finn? He's the seven foot tall alien whose reluctant mission it is to destroy the Earth. Or Thomas Hauptmann, an unwilling Time Traveller. Or even Rachel, the 300 year old woman. There are also less exotic problems facing Robinson's characters, but they are no less challenging nor their solutions less intriguing and twist-laden.

Robinson's book is, to be pretentious, decidedly Serlingesque. Both writers choose the bar setting, ideal as a locale offering maximum human interaction and a rich source of auxiliary plot action. The element of humour, both blatant and low-key is prevalent in both. Inherent to the works of both men is a basic positivism about the human condition that argues for the essential worth of every person. And like Serling, neither frills nor pseudo-intellectualizing are included to mar Robinson's book.

Callahan's Cross-time Saloon is a masterpiece in the Serling tradition. Robinson has, as Serling did before him, the ability to bring a touch of innocence to the harsh realities of the time and place he lives in. This rapprochement between heart and mind, an occurrence almost singularly unique to SF of all the literary genres, has been assured a bright future by this novice writer.

"Bilingu" Al Kreeber

An end to bulldozing in cold blood

Another pearl of our city will be ground down by North America's vernacular, the bulldozer. One of E. J. Lennox' houses (the turn of the century Toronto architect from whose sketch-book Casa Loma and the Old City Hall came into being) is on the verge of demolition. Succumbing to profit-motivation, the Rosedale site is to be indiscriminately covered by a housing project, distinguished by its Mississauga-style ordinariness.

The Lennox house calls for attention: it is the first significant building cited for demolition following recent attempts by local architects to save the Don Jail from a similar fate by suggesting alternative uses. But substituting for the traditional city fabric developers' irrelevancies is so commonplace today that one wonders the subject is discussed in architectural circles at all. The question arises: how capable are architects of withstanding the North American double-featured development capitareaucracy.

One of the more reasonable ways to interpret the decline of our profession is through Marx' Manifesto: "The bourgeoisie has stripped of its halo, every occupation hitherto honoured and looked up to with reverend awe." If we temporarily ignore the misery of other disciplines and narrow the concern down, we can note how striking is the negation between our architecture and contemporary socio-political affairs.

"Architecture and town planning are simply the spatial expression of human conduct," declares Dutch architect Aldo Van Eyck. And therefore, if we do not enjoy freedom of conduct, then the greatest possibilities of architecture are negated. The combination of capitalism (a system whereby property is accumulated in the hands of fewer people) and government bureaucracy (an entity in charge of implementing the state's controls) cause and in turn, depend upon the depression of the individual, through the centralization of management and power of decision.

Differing definitions of the good life persist even into the higher levels of ideology.

For the concretization of this argument it will suffice to compare the futuristic vision of the "system" and architecture. A western political figure: "We can expect to see an increasing bureaucratic involvement in virtually every aspect of the lives of individual citizens. This will mean a gradual reduction of the freedom of choice and individual responsibility." Team Ten, on the other hand: "New society will provide man with opportunities so that he will be able to maintain an individual relation to total life: the right to have a personal opinion about life." The point is that a confrontation is inevitable.

At present it is almost absurd to indulge any hope that any battle versus the establishment will be won. Even Leon Krier's La-Villette project (for which the dominant theses were the decentralization of the megalopolis into local communities (quarters) and the reconstitution of the city on the scale of the individual) can be considered ineffective in terms of its capacity as a model of action. And isn't Krier's Marxist ideology as close as you can get to the reformation of urban society along non-capitalistic lines?

In this light we are left with frightening duty, to sum up the profession's history book with the words of Takefumi Aida the Architect: "There is no longer any way to save architecture; only silence can help."

This pessimism, that even condemns the validity of the writing of this article, gives us the licence to abandon our futile work at the drafting board and join the El Mocambo generation in their quietism of despair.

Yet, the motivation for remaining within the walls of an architectural school, working nights and days and preparing projects for the final presentation, as we all do, can be evidently read as an assertive faith; despite the ominousness of the situation we, crazily enough, believe in a better future; we all possess some brave spark of optimism within us. At least, I do.

Optimism leads us in two ways: As Manfredo Tafuri suggests: "When the role of a discipline ceases to exist, to try to stop the course of things is only regressive Utopia, and of the worst kind; (and since an alternative role was not yet articulated) one is left to navigate in empty space in which everything can happen."

Dismissing the old role, one is presented with the golden opportunity to start fresh; to invent his own architecture and definitions, emancipated from criticism from the past and from the entire spectrum of traditional bonds and historical responsibilities. One starts from the very beginning of an unknown course and thus is doomed to create something entirely, one hundred per cent, totally new.

Architecture that evokes from within; from the innermost chambers of our hearts; a rebirth; architecture of the founders of the second cycle. Another path an optimist would travel by is that of disbelief in the D-Day prophets who condemn the efficacy of the old role.

"It is only the architect who may give man the possibility to express his right to live a personal way of life through constructed volume." It follows that, sticking to our hereditary assignment (expressed above by Bakema) in a North-American context requires a type of defensive response; our major task turns out to be the protection of the individual's environmental freedom from various controls.

By reducing the individual's (or a community of individuals') materialistic dependencies on the outer world, a protection of his habitat from oppressive infringements is established. The right of autonomy, so intrinsic in democracy, yet unapparent in our chaotic cities, is presently sought by the growing concerned public more than ever before; it is only the architect who may make the new anti-establishment social dynamics environmentally feasible. An underground architecture. Whatever branch of optimism one associates oneself with it will involve rocking the boat a bit.

Vic Edges Dents in Interfac Semi-Final

By JAMES McLEAN

The Interfac Division I playoffs seem to be evolving the way they should with the better teams continuing on to the final. Wednesday night's game at Varsity Arena proved no exception as Vic I defeated Dents 3-2 to give themselves an 11-5 two-game total goal semi-final victory.

All the elements of a playoff game were there; a larger than normal crowd, a slow Zamboni, a late start, and a less than adequate trumpet player. These factors didn't seem to effect either team, as both came on the ice with the idea of winning. Dents however had to overcome a 5 goal margin established in the first game last Monday to continue on.

It appeared during the early part of the first period that the larger and more physical Vic team would walk away with the game. If it wasn't for the strong performance of Dents' goalie C. Johnston this may have been the case.

Later on, however, things began to even themselves out as Dents displayed a fairly serious offensive testing Vic's goalie G. Railton on several occasions. But as luck would have it Vic's J. Langley shovelled in a goal during a goal mouth scramble to give his team a 1-0 lead.

The second period began in an entirely different key with a Vic player unnecessarily laying some heavy lumber on Johnston. This seemed to be the spark to light the fire as several Dents players retaliated with some high sticking and shoving.

With two men short on either team, neither team could put the puck in the net. The goalposts seemed to be making more saves than the goalies.

To blench the game further, a Dents player took a two-hander to a Vic forward retiring him for the rest of the game. At this point the game couldn't have gone anywhere but uphill and such was the case as Vic's P. Damp blasted a perfect shot in behind Johnston with 30 seconds remaining in the second period.

The third period opened up with some real playoff hockey. Vic especially, as they pumelled goalie Johnston forcing him to make two spectacular successive saves. But it was only a matter of moments before Vic finally connected with a goal on a shot by P. Pattison.

Dents were not to be left flatfooted. Their persistent effort proved rewarding as they ended the game with two quick goals leaving only a one goal margin for the game but allowing an even larger six goal margin for the series.

If it hadn't been for the unnecessary hacking and shinny antics by both teams, this game would have ended in style. Neither team proved to be a good winner or loser. To continue further, it is my prediction that if Vic doesn't get down to the first class hockey they are capable of, they will lose the championship to a consistently first class St. Michael's club.

Excessive penalties and fighting may prove beneficial during regular season play, but when it gets down to the playoffs, the team displaying the greatest control in both checking and scoring will be the ultimate victors. The season's too long and the playoffs are too short to risk any other style of play.

St. Mikes and Erindale Clash

By NEIL MICHAEL DAVIDSON

The final score was 2-2, but St. Mike's advanced to the finals of the interfac hockey championships on the basis of their 5-3 win over Erindale in the first leg of the semi-final.

It was a penalty-filled game, with St. Mike's guilty of most of the infractions. However except for a few out-and-out fights, most of the calls were for such misdemeanors as hooks and slashes.

St. Mike's opened the scoring in the first period. As both teams were one man short, Bill Leclair skated into the Erindale end. Unbelievably, Erindale was adeptly covering everyone except Leclair so he cruised in on net and blasted a shot behind the goalie.

Erindale tied it up later in the period with a scrappy powerplay goal by Mike Borsok. Erindale's tactic of planting an enormous player in front of the net paid off; Borsok had an empty net to shoot at since one of his colleagues was lying on top of the SMC goalie.

The second period was long, drawn-out and violent. No goals but an amazing play which looked like an out-take from the film Slapshot. It all started when Erindale's Bob Jones delivered a nasty blow directed at Wayne Hamill's head after play had been blown dead. As one SMC player lay prostrate on the ice, the result of a nasty butt-end, Hamill chased Jones all over the rink, caught him several times and severely pumelled the hapless Erindale lad. Both players were ejected.

Back to hockey in the third period and Erindale came out like a wounded bull elephant. Both goalies were sparking in the end-to-end play that followed. With three minutes left, Erindale's Rory O'Neil slapped in a rebound on a powerplay and the score was 2-1. SMC's lead had been reduced to one goal.

St. Mike's hit right back as soon as Erindale managed to pull their goalie. Bill Leclair broke loose and scored his second into the empty net.

Game over as SMC preserved their lead from the first game to enter the finals.

Kudos go out to the referee and timekeeper for controlling an undisciplined game. Erindale fought well, but St. Mike's were simply the better team. They're big, hard-hitting, and exciting to watch.

All in all a game with something for everyone. Both hockey fans and potential axe-murderers went home satisfied.

Side Line By-Line

By GLYNIS PETERS

Ostensibly, the Intercollegiate sports season has drawn to a close. All major championships have taken place and Toronto can sit back and review a remarkably successful year.

Women's field hockey set the pace by bringing home the Canadian National Title. Donna Allaby and Jean Gourlay were named to the all-star squad, and Liz Hoffman easily wrapped up coach of the year honours.

The swim team captured the Ontario Crown and placed third at the Nationals. Kathy Anderson led her archery squad to the Indoor Championships, and the Track team pulled through to win the Indoor Finals.

These results are an obvious testimony to the increasing commitment of the women athletes at U of T. This trend is evident throughout the world of women's sports. Antiquated training methods are being constantly up-dated as more doors open to women in all areas of competition. This is an area where women are being challenged to prove their claims of untapped potential. All resources are now being made available to assist the female athlete at all levels.

For many Intercollegiate competitions at Toronto, the word "season" has little meaning. After a short layoff immediately after the final competition, training commences again with an eye to the future. The campus boasts Provincial, National and Olympic athletes who must train all year round and in many cases are reaping the benefits of their dedication.

But the majority of women find satisfaction in competing at the Intramural level, and for them it's a different sport every month. The league is open to every skill level and provides some intense competition between faculties and colleges.

Faces become familiar over the years as they appear on the basketball court and then again at Varsity Arena or on the other side of the badminton net.

The incredible organization behind the Intramural Program originates from the Athletic executives of each college and faculty. The involvement reaches a wider base as one includes all the curators who co-ordinate schedules and pull teams together.

The point is that many women are involved in athletics at U of T in varied capacities. Contrary to a popular myth, sports are not the sacred domain of Phys-ed women. Intercollegiate teams are not impossible to make, and intramurals are open to everyone.

The dramatic increase of women's participation in university sports has naturally led to newspaper coverage. For the third year, the Varsity has provided space for women's sports stories. It would seem that women would be anxious to take advantage of this opportunity to finally give recognition where it is due; the chance to make more women aware of all sports at U of T and mistaken attitudes towards the programs offered.

Surprisingly enough, interest in this area is lagging behind all others. Women did not answer the call to take credit for their endeavours and make known their new dedication. Consequently, it was only through the efforts of a very few writers that any women's sports was printed.

It should become a final step in the competition to record the outcome of the event. The reporter must take her place beside referees, competitors and organizers.

Women are making great strides forward, let's not keep it a secret.

Big Benson Banquet

Next Tuesday night, the women's athletic banquet gets under way as Intercollegiate competitors get together for their own unique brand of culinary celebrations.

The highlight of this gastronomic gala is definitely the presentation of two prestigious women's sports awards: The Hill-Powell Administration Award and the Benson Award.

The Hill-Powell administration award is awarded annually to an individual student contributing most to the administration of the Women's Athletic Association, while the Benson award is presented to a student in her graduating year selected for outstanding ability in athletics and scholarships.

In other sports news, itinerant Varsity sports editor Jim O'Leary is out of town hot on the trail of the Blues' hockey endeavours in Moncton. Blues are hoping to bring home another national championship and O'Leary is hoping to bring home another national championship story.

Troubled Sanskrit department faces collapse

By BLAIR HUNTER

U of T's Department of Sanskrit and Indian Studies faces imminent collapse amid a welter of personal problems and hostilities.

According to department chairman Ronald Morton-Smith the breakup is unrelated to finance or cutbacks to the university budget.

Smith said, "The situation was discussed March 13 and the decision to dissolve came from within the department itself."

Smith cautiously stated that "the decision to dissolve was reached because of human relations within the department.

"Problems within the ranks of the staff have become projected on to the students to the degree that very little could be accomplished in the department," Smith said.

Smith's term of office as chairman ends this year. He said that "a successor acceptable to staff, students and administration is not available in the department."

Course Union representative Richard Davis stated that students were consulted on the possibility of dissolution and they are basically satisfied now that a decision has been reached.

Davis said, "It is disappointing, but in light of the situation there was nothing else to be done."

This "situation," Davis said, "is hard to fathom; the hostility amongst the eight or nine professors in the department goes back several years."

The individuals concerned were reluctant to comment, fearing slander or retaliation.

Davis added, "If the administration approves this departmental decision by July 1 then the department will be phased out by September 1978. If not we will be in some kind of limbo for another year."

The Department of Sanskrit and Indian Studies was part of the Department of East Asian Studies until it became an autonomous organization in 1971.

With a note of confidence Smith said that all the courses now available should be offered through other departments next year.

Smith also stated that, "No one would lose their job over this and it is hoped that the TA's will be retained for another year at least."

In Canada, Sanskrit and Indian Studies departments exist only at the University of Saskatchewan, the University of British Columbia and McMaster University.

English classes will swell

By URIEL WITTENBERG

Larger English classes at the second and third-year level are in store for next year as a result of cutbacks in the department.

Milton Wilson, chairman of the English department, indicated yesterday that class sizes at these levels will go up, while "we're trying to maintain small class sizes" at the freshman and fourth-year levels.

Wilson was requested by Faculty of Arts and Science dean Arthur Kruger last week to submit a budget for his department with a cutback closer to 6 per cent, not the per cent figure earlier presented to the faculty as a whole.

Wilson acknowledged that next year's budget will mean staff layoffs in the department. Although he refused to give figures, he said the reduction in the number of TA's will be "very small." Questioned about the number of instructors to be laid off, he said, "I'm not going to try to estimate that situation."

Dean Kruger said that reduced department budgets are the only way to meet the three per cent or $14-million cutback that the faculty faces. He outlined some criteria which are used to determine the relative severity of cutbacks among departments.

If a department has mostly full-time staff and little non-academic staff, it is considered more difficult to cut back its budget.

Departments with "heavy enrolment pressures" such as Sociology are also less likely to be as severely cut back, said Kruger. He pointed to some of the wide disparities in class sizes in the faculty. Students in high-enrolment courses are "entitled" to reasonable course sizes, he said.

He denied, however, that departments would be funded according to their popularity with students. He said he would be very reluctant to cut back some small departments, where this could mean "destroying a discipline." He cited small language departments as examples. If forced to lay off an instructor, some of these might be unable to continue offering a particular language, he said.

Kruger refused to disclose budget figures pertaining to particular departments.

Athletic fee increase turned down

Students will not be faced with a $2 athletic fee increase next year. Instead the Department of Athletics will be subject to cutbacks.

The motion to raise athletics fees was defeated by a vote of 4-3 at a meeting of the Internal Affairs Committee of Governing Council yesterday.

Eight weeks ago the department implemented a number of cutbacks to avoid a fee increase. However, because of miscalculations of student enrolment for the 1977-1978 school year by the Internal Affairs Office, the department was forced to request a $2 increase.

Failure to get the fee increase may result in the elimination of at least one major area of the Athletic department's program, and jeopardize the jobs of some of its employees.

The department has been hit with cutbacks totaling 10.5 per cent of its budget.

SAC trims budget

By KATHY CANTY

A large number of campus services and programs will be eliminated next year under the budget passed by the Students Administrative Council (SAC) executive on Monday.

The council has to reduce its expenses by $40,000 next year to meet an anticipated income of $140,100 because the SAC fee referendum failed and fees have remained static since 1968, according to SAC president John Tuzyk. The cutback was designed to avoid further large deficits such as this year's $40,000 deficit incurred by inflation and new programs, he explained.

Since students opposed the proposed $4 fee hike, the executive felt that they could not budget for a similar deficit next year, said Tuzyk. Instead they allowed for a deficit of $6,000 next year. The money for the deficit will come from a surplus fund which SAC members call the "nest egg."

Among the services which may disappear next year are the folk concert series, the tri-campus pubs, the Roam Around, the employment survey, the survival kit, the SAC page in the Varsity, and SAC's involvement in both athletic and homecoming events.

"The preference was to axe whole programs" rather than make across-the-board cuts, said Tuzyk. The executive established priorities and decided to give adequate funding to services it wanted to keep.

In addition, SAC will be sending fewer people to conferences next year and will be giving less money to the Campus Legal Aid program. The fund for such special projects as the U of T Review will drop from $16,000 to $14,000. Moreover, SAC budgetted for one less "Special Projects" employee next year.

The major areas to be cut were communications, services and administrative expenses. But there was no attempt to cut back in any particular area, said Tuzyk. "Every individual program was looked at."

The executive kept the programs "we felt students wanted us to keep," he added. Also, projects which need too much money to stay afloat were eliminated, said Tuzyk.

If students had supported the fee hike in the referendum, SAC could have expanded its programs, according to SAC Commissioner Brian O'Riordan. But "we've been told by our constituents that they don't want expansion." By defeating the referendum, students told SAC that they want a level of services that can be offered by a fee of $12 per head, he added.

The SAC executive's budget recommendations will go before the new SAC Board of Directors next Wednesday. The budget will be examined again by the SAC Board in the fall.

Grad Post affair: more wrangling

By ANDREW MAHON

The procedural wrangling which plagued the Horvath affair since its discussion at the last GSU council meeting was again in evidence yesterday at a Graduate Association of Students in Political Science (GASPS) meeting held yesterday.

Debate ensued from the start of the meeting when the order of the agenda was discussed. The first item, the dispute between Maria Horvath and the Graduate Students Union (GSU) executive, was relegated to second position in favor of discussing the role of GASPS, and GASPS reps in the dispute between the GSU executive, the Grad Post editor and the GSU council.

Grad Post editor Horvath was on hand at the meeting to make remarks about the definition of slander and to outline what could or could not be discussed.

GSU vice-president Leo Casey in turn requested a reading of a letter from a union official (Horvath's Union) addressed to GASPS president Tom Kuhn warning Kuhn that discussion of Horvath's grievance procedure outside guidelines for that procedure would serve only to "exacerbate the matter".

Kuhn's actions at the last GSU meeting and with respect to a letter he sent to The Varsity about Horvath was criticized by GASPS member and GSU treasurer John Johnson who wanted to know, in the light of Kuhn's action, whether this was GASPS policy.

Kuhn replied by differentiating between GASPS policy toward Horvath and his own attitude to Horvath.

GSU chairperson and GASPS member Elliot Seide then presented a motion that any representative of GASPS be bound by GASPS policy at meetings such as those of the GSU general council.

The motion was ruled out of order by the chair and precipitated a challenge to the ruling.

The challenge was supported, the motion upheld, and it passed overwhelmingly.

GSU vice-president Leo Casey said that "because of the fact we are involved in a grievance procedure here, we believe it to be a confidential matter. It is our intention to present all the facts at the general council meeting on Thursday," he added.

Ontario Region Canadian University Press (CUP) president Eric McMillan, who was invited to the meeting, then gave a brief summary of the CUP preliminary report which was released last week on the Grad Post situation.

Casey then pointed out that the three members of the CUP commission were appointed by McMillan (who is Varsity layout editor), Horvath and by CUP.

"That's hardly our idea of an impartial review party," remarked Casey. "We participated in order that CUP may be allowed to clean up its house — it didn't."

Casey went on to suggest that any endorsement of the CUP commission would be supporting a report "which is in favor of union-busting."

Another motion was raised which stated that "it (GASPS) deploras any real or apparent use of the GASPS association by individuals or groups to further partisan or individual cases... which have nothing to do with GASPS to further individual or partisan causes."

This motion was amended and passed, and the meeting was adjourned.

Leo Casey, vice-president GSU

Jobs still around for summer

By ARTHUR ROTENBERG

Essays may be piling for U of T students, but the summer job hunt still looms large on the horizon. For those students still puzzling as to what to do The Varsity surveyed some of the summer employment programs set up for students.

The Ontario provincial Government offers a program called Ontario Experience '78 which offers 13,500 jobs for Ontario youth.

Applications are available at U of T's Career Counselling and Placement Centre (CCPC) or by calling 965-0546. The deadline is April 1, 1978.

Under Experience '78, 75 job programs are available in 21 ministries with the largest number in the Ministry of Culture and Recreation (4,000 positions), the Ministry of Natural Resources (3,500 positions), the Ministry of Community and Social Services (1,200 positions) and the Ministry of Education (1,200 positions).

The largest single program offers 3,000 positions in a variety of community-based projects that develop cultural and recreational services for people of all ages in areas that include sports to race relations, drama, films and photography. The second largest program offers 2,300 manual, technical and clerical positions in the field of resource management. Most of the programs offer opportunities throughout Ontario for periods of 12 to 16 weeks.

The jobs offered included positions at the Ontario Science Centre, the Royal Ontario Museum or the Art Gallery of Ontario, projects in energy conservation and legal aid clinics (for law students). The Ministry of the Environment also offers 433 positions in environment-related projects.

Students who want to run their own summer businesses can do so through the Venture Capital Program which offers 100 interest-free loans to a maximum of $1,000. Venture Capital is in its fifth year and according to Government spokesmen most of last year's experiments were profitable.

Projects ranged from sealing driveways to raising steers on frozen blueberry waffles (according to Queen's Park sources). Farming green peppers, selling summer fashions and painting houses were some of the other ventures. Financial advice is provided by the Royal Bank and the Ontario Chamber of Commerce.

Another approach to summer jobs is the Industrial Work Project of the Student Christian Movement. Students work in industry, live and study communally (usually in a church hall) and share wages in a pool. Interested students should contact the SCM at 736 Bathurst St. (The official deadline was March 15.)

Students can also try Canada Manpower and the CCPC. However, a CCPC report indicates that 59 per cent of students got jobs through telephone calls, 23 per cent by applying in person, 18 per cent by contacting former employers, and 18 per cent by asking friends and relatives.

The placement centre itself was the source of only 16 per cent of jobs. It offers directories of companies, (a media directory lists radio, television, and publishing firms across the country), university calendars and career information.

If students decide to go out West (on the pipeline for example), the Edmonton Manpower office handles most Northwestern jobs. The jobs pay very well but should be applied for early.

If you get really desperate, remember this story: last year, one student went to the T-D Centre, knocked on 101 doors, filled out 64 applications, had 12 interviews and 4 job offers. He also wore out 4 pairs of shoes, 12 knuckles, 64 pencils and took 101 elevator rides.

Election results

SAC elections

Election time has come and gone at U of T and the votes have all been counted at the Students' Administrative Council (SAC) offices.

The big winners were Brian Hill, Mark McElwain and Reva Sober in the presidential elections, and the referendum on the proposed SAC fee increase ($4 over the previous years) was defeated by 434 votes.

The five SAC reps for New College are Gary Elliott, Dawn Renfrew, Connie Kristiansen, Stephen Fruitmen and Charles Hardy.

St. Mike's reps will be Brian O'Riordan, Susanna Kelley, Stephen Quinn, Julia Greczylo and Anthony Cusimano.

The Department of Applied Science and Engineering also has five members on the SAC Board of Directors: Joe Lstiburek, Jan Arkema, Chris Horne, Michael McCaffery and Peter Wolfe.

Trinity College has but one rep and he will be Christopher DuVerne.

University College's five SAC reps will be Philip De Groot, Elaine Lewis, Peter Jacobs, Michael Wernick and Stan Freedman.

In a close race at Victoria College Bill MacNeil, Susan Frid, Scott Garvie, Pam De Young, Michael Brownell and Liela Ghammer emerged victorious.

The representative for St. Hilda's College will be Jane Bowly and for Innis, Kate Bishop, both running against only one other opponent.

All the other university constituencies were filled by acclamation.

Gov Con results

Elections for Governing Council ended last Thursday. The following people were elected to serve a one-year term:

Representing full-time undergraduates are Jules Bloch, Donald Guloien, Richard Johnston and Mark Wax.

Representing part-time undergraduates are Bev Batten and John Dadds.

Representing graduate students are Jacqueline Tetroe and Anthony Usher.

Representing teaching staff are James Conacher, Stephen Triantis, Victor Smith and Charles Pascal.

Dave Tennenhouse reacted quietly to his loss in last Thursday's election for Governing Council.

Asked to comment on the reasons for his defeat, Tennenhouse said, "To be quite honest, partisan voting by students registered at OISE who make up most of the constituency" caused the defeat.

Tennenhouse was vying with Jacqueline Tetroe, an OISE student for a position as the Graduate Students' representative on Governing Council.

Of the some 4,800 students in the Graduate constituency, 2,900 of them are at OISE.

"I knew I was in trouble when I found out that so many were from OISE," Tennenhouse said.

"However, I was fairly pleased to do as well as I did under the circumstances," he added.

The vote was 301 for Tetroe, 264 for Tennenhouse.

Varsity taken over

A motley group of Varsity staffers armed with literature and empty ballots forced their way into next year's The Varsity masthead Monday night.

The group who used a little-known Varsity by-law called an election, will now be able to enjoy lots of nyuks as next year's sub-editorial staff.

Best known for their collective ability to save McDonald coupons, the merry masthead boasts an impressive list of ex-Zamboni drivers including City editor Andrew Mahon, last seen with Born to Run slipped under his coat, on his way to indulge in his favorite hobby—painting the undersides of turtles.

Other members include news editor Katherine Canty who promises to continue uncovering the real snatch on campus.

Other winners in the win-a-masthead contest are co-photo editors Eitan Hassan and Brigitte Mertling and Hugh (he shoots, he scores) Stuart, sports editor.

Norma Green and Eileen Capes will layout in tandem, while Roberta Clare, tape-recorder-in-hand, gets to be features editor.

All these lucky people will work under the watchful eye of Web editor Geordie Cook, bon vivant and raconteur of many tales.

I want to "clarify . . . once and for all that no able student in this province will ever be denied the opportunity to proceed to higher education is he has the desire and the ability to do so."

William Davis
The Varsity Sept. 18, 1967

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the University.

The Varsity is managed by the Varsity Committee, which is responsible for the management, financial policies, and editorial integrity of The Varsity.

An express function of the committee is to receive and consider complaints about the paper. Formal signed complaints are opposed to letters to the editor — should be addressed to: The Chairman, Varsity Committee, 91 St. George St., Toronto, Ontario.

FREE THE GRAD POST

If the GSU executive has any political sense left it will drop the warnings of dismissal against Grad Post editor Maria Horvath, make a public apology to her and abide by the findings of the Canadian University Press Commission of Inquiry at tomorrow's (Thursday) GSU general meeting.

We say "political sense" rather than decency because the GSU executive has demonstrated a total lack of this virtue throughout the entire proceedings. The letter from the Committee for a Responsible GSU, which we print below, documents this very well.

Although the immediate question is that justice be done to a particular individual the issue goes deeper than that. Should a student paper be controlled by the student union that publishes it? Should it be just a house organ or an independent paper run by its own staff?

The GSU executive claims that it upholds freedom of the press. When the gay liberation paper, The Body Politic, was raided by the police, the GSU helped organize a forum in its defense. All the more ridiculous, therefore, that when it comes to the Grad Post the GSU executive doesn't feel obliged to stick to the same principles. Presumably "freedom of the press" is superfluous when one's publisher happens to be as august and omniscient a body as the GSU executive.

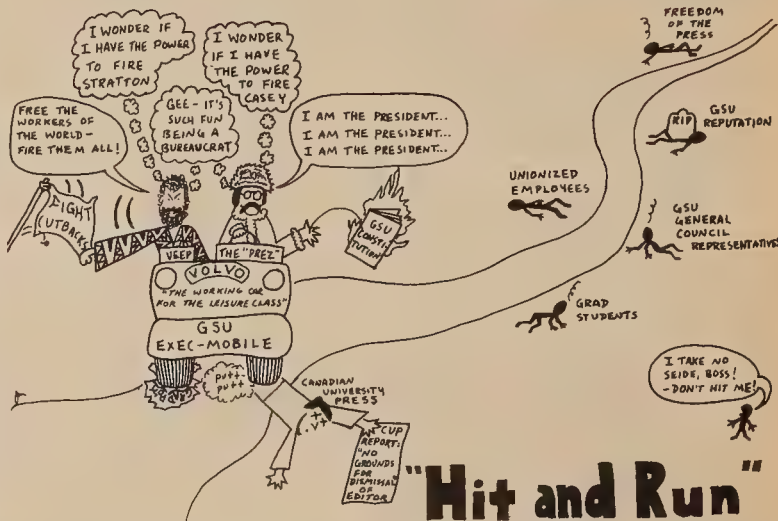

The reaction of the GSU executive, or to be more accurate, of its treasurer John Johnson, is instructive in itself. Johnson's letter was typed on GSU stationery so his reaction is presumably that of the GSU executive.

Johnson does two things in his letter. He quotes selectively and out of context from the CUP report those sections which he thinks would help the executive case and then tries to discredit the very commission he quotes earlier on. He mentions, for example, that the CUP commission expressed reservations about Horvath's financial abilities but suppresses that part of the report which expressly states that this deficiency on Horvath's part does not constitute grounds for dismissal. He quotes the report as saying that the GSU executive has a right to criticize the Grad Post but fails to mention that the commission also made it very clear that such criticism should be done through channels such as letters to the editor, memos and conversations, and not through administrative channels like the warnings of dismissal that were handed to Horvath.

This kind of double-dealing is characteristic of the GSU executive's behaviour throughout this dispute. Not to be outdone by the junior bureaucrats on the GSU executive, CUPE local 1281 shop steward Peter Gallus put on a show of his own. At the Feb. 22 GSU general meeting Gallus vied with vice-president Leo Casey and acting chairperson Charles Reichlin (in a cameo performance) to rule out of order all discussion of the issue. So anxious was Gallus to defend a local member that he could not allow her to speak in her defense. Ostensibly the reason for this cover-up was that the grievance procedure was of a confidential nature. However, there is no provision in the contract between Horvath and the GSU for confidentiality. Gallus was also caught in defining Horvath's employer to be the GSU executive rather than the GSU as a whole, a definition that allows the executive to deal with Horvath without being answerable to the GSU membership.

At yesterday's general meeting of the Graduate Association of Students in Political Science (GASPS), an attempt was made to gag GASPS president Tom Kuhn, an outspoken critic of the GSU executive's handling of the Grad Post dispute. Elliot Seide, "neutral" chairperson of the GSU council, was the initiator of a motion to bind GASPS reps to the GASPS position, which as it was later defined, meant no position whatsoever. Needless to say, Leo Casey and John Johnson, both members of GASPS voted for the motion. Amidst charges that the meeting had been stacked the motion was rammed through.

"Hit and Run"

The whole issue will be resolved tomorrow at the GSU general meeting. It is important that all students concerned about the independence of the Grad Post, in particular graduate students, come to the meeting and voice their concern. The GSU executive has been able to get away with murder so far because they have restricted the discussion to bodies which they control. If enough students turn out on Thursday freedom of the press may have a fighting chance.

OPINION: Defend the Grad Post

For too long individuals such as Tom Kuhn have waged unassisted, efforts to expose to public view the unprincipled and irresponsible conduct of the Graduate Students' Union executive.

To aid them in their efforts and to defend the principles under attack by the GSU executive, the Committee for a Responsible GSU has been formed by persons throughout the university community.

Without consulting the GSU General Council and without a clear jurisdiction, the GSU executive initiated dismissal procedures against Grad Post editor Maria Horvath on Jan. 23. Eventually Canadian University Press (CUP), the national organization of student newspapers called for an investigation commission to report on the dispute.

The commission's first mandate was to see whether the GSU executive had violated CUP's principles which protect freedom of the student press.

The commission's preliminary report stated "the sum total of charges and complaints raised by the GSU executive in the letters of warning and subsequent discussion with the commission do not warrant dismissal action at this point." The report stated the GSU executive failed to provide sufficient evidence to substantiate their charges against Horvath. It attributed the most serious difficulties between the GSU executive and the paper to the Grad Post's location in the same offices as the GSU, making an independent newspaper nearly impossible. The commission recommended a number of steps to remedy the situation.

The GSU executive has yet to follow through on a single CUP recommendation. In their attempts to get rid of the Grad Post editor the GSU executive has relied on slanders, untruths, suppression of discussion, secrecy, personal attacks and political pressure on anyone who dared to stand up to their manipulations.

The original "grounds for dismissal" included Horvath not publishing the expected number of pages, not paying debts and leaving the office door open.

All these charges were handily discredited by Horvath: the expected average number of pages has been maintained except once (due to illness), the outstanding debts are small and usual for such a newspaper, and the office door is often left open at the GSU when staff members move between offices. While the editor admitted she did not adhere to a strict schedule of invoicing local advertisers, this in no way can be interpreted as amounting to professional negligence.

We won't even catalogue such laughable charges as breaking the Xerox machine (the Xerox repairman laughed at that one, too). The GSU executive repeated the flimsy charges and added a few more of the same calibre in a second warning letter from Leo Casey, GSU vice-president. Apparently they aren't influenced by the truth.

After this they used every dubious means, every political manoeuvre, every connection, to suppress open discussion about the Grad Post situation and to spread rumours about the target of their attack.

They kept Tom Kuhn, president of the Graduate Association for Students in Political Science (GASPS) from being the first speaker on the item he put on the agenda at the Feb. 22 GSU council meeting. Instead, they presented first the GSU executive's and union steward Peter Gallus' opinions that the matter could not be discussed except regarding procedure because of an alleged "confidentiality of the grievance procedure".

And they ruled everything substantial "out of order." Horvath's verbatim reading of a section of her contract was "out of order." A motion asking that Horvath not be disciplined before the CUP commission released its report was "out of order." Tom Kuhn was "out of order" dozens of times.

But even this small amount of opposition was too much for the GSU executive.

When the Varsity reported accurately on the meeting, Casey demanded a meeting of the Varsity Committee to force the paper to publish a front page retraction. The Committee rejected his arguments.

When the Varsity continued to report on the dispute, Casey attacked the paper and the reporter, Andrew Mahon, who had no interest in the dispute before attending the GSU meeting as a reporter.

When Tom Kuhn continued to press for freedom of the press, the GSU's chairpersons and executive singled him out for an attack within his own course union.

Nor is it explained how Kuhn is "personally involved in the case and very biased" as Elliot Seide cries in letters to the Varsity. Kuhn has never written for the Grad Post or ever before been on any but good terms with GSU members and executive prior to this dispute.

Moreover, the GSU executive's so-called "confidentiality of the grievance procedure" has been exposed as the trick it is, serving to keep a shroud of secrecy around the GSU executive's dealings. A Varsity article quoted minutes from a closed session of the GSU executive in which Casey told executive members to claim "confidentiality" when questioned.

The Ontario Labour Relations Board points out that no confidentiality is involved in a grievance procedure unless so stipulated in a collective agreement with the union (which it is not in this case). Legal advice has confirmed this reading. Even union steward Peter Gallus, who used this tactic, now admits he was wrong.

Meanwhile, editor Horvath has been continually harassed by the GSU executive, perhaps in the vain hope that she could be bullied into resigning. She has been deluged with letter after letter from Casey, citing one ploy after another. She has been the victim of a slander campaign which seeks to exploit the fact that she is a woman.

Will the GSU executive be allowed to continue their cruel and abusive mistreatment of Horvath, despite the findings of a review by her professional organization?

The GSU executive must be forced by all those GSU Council members and graduate students who believe in decency and fair play to accept the findings of the CUP investigation Commission and to comply immediately with the Commission's recommendations.

A person's career and future are on the line and common decency demands that she must not be sacrificed to satisfy the insatiable egos of a few individuals who cannot admit when they are wrong.

WE DEMAND that the GSU executive accept the CUP Commission's findings, immediately follow the Commission's recommendations, withdraw all warning letters and related material from Horvath's employment file, immediately terminate the dismissal procedure, and apologize in writing to Horvath for challenging, without legitimate grounds, her reputation as an editor.

We call upon all GSU General Council members and other students to attend the General Council meeting (this Thursday, March 23 at 7:00 p.m. in Sylvester's Restaurant, 16 Bancroft Street) and to require the executive to abide by the findings and recommendations of the CUP Commission report.

Mobilizing students

As the Varsity reporter who stayed in Evans' office with the twelve occupiers for most of two days, and as an individual who played an active role in mobilizing students for March 16, I have some understanding of the amount of work that went into making the Queen's Park demonstration a success. As a result, I find it a little hard to swallow the self-righteous criticism directed at the leaders of the event coming mainly from those who have never, nor will ever, lead a significant political movement, but who are always willing to rumble with the police at the drop of a slogan.

Indeed, it was a disturbing sight to see elected student representatives shoulder to shoulder with Metro's finest. But have any of you courageous writers-of-editorials considered what would have happened if they hadn't? Are you really so naive as to believe that a single line of police on the steps of the legislature was the sum total of the government's welcoming committee?

If anyone had bothered to talk to the organizers of the demonstration they would have found out that there was a substantial number of riot police waiting inside the building. (Considering the number of occupations that took place around the province, it would have been surprising if things had been otherwise.)

No mention was made of this fact in Friday's Varsity. As a reporter for The Varsity, I have been counselled to get both sides of a story. Why weren't OFS and individuals like Leo Casey and Kevin Schwenker accorded this elementary courtesy?

In 1974 I had the opportunity to see riot police in action when members of the Native Peoples' Caravan were driven off Parliament Hill by the RCMP riot squad. Several years ago, I was arrested on the picketline of the Artistic Woodworking strike, and saw firsthand the way Metro police treat demonstrators. Confrontations with the police are never pretty, and the good guys rarely win.

Admittedly, there was some popular sentiment for an occupation of the legislature. But the main push for such an action came from the ranks of ultra-leftist zombies who habitually attempt to turn broad-based protest demonstrations into a free-for-all.

The fact is that, while the turnout for the demonstration was excellent, it was only the beginning. Subtract all the people from York, Ryerson and out of town who were there so that the participation of U of T was less than spectacular. Where were all the others? They were back in their classes, nervous about participating in a demonstration and not yet fully aware of how seriously government cutback policies are confronting them. The task of those who participated in the demonstration was just as the organizers described it: to go back to their various campuses and organize those who have not yet made a commitment to the struggle for their basic right to a quality education. A bloody, pointless confrontation with riot police would simply have made the job of convincing the undecided that much more difficult. Such a photogenic melee would undoubtedly have delighted the Ontario government.

One suspects many of those who share Mario Coutar's and Eric McMillan's distaste for the organizers' advice do so out of a sense of jealousy. They have never been able to organize anything more politically meaningful than those minuscule groups of pseudo-revolutionaries that sporadically, and briefly, erupt like pimples on the face of the body politic.

OFS and other organizations and individuals are charged with the responsibility of building the student movement. By preventing the demonstration from turning into a hopeless battle, they were defending the long-term interests of that movement.

As you say, Mario and Eric, we will have more demonstrations. The chants will get louder and louder and the crowd more and more militant. But it will happen in spite of your involvement, not because of it.

Varsity staffer

Whose interests?

As one of the students who was pilloried in Friday's Varsity for serving as a student marshal at the Queen's Park demonstration allow me to answer Phil Libman's question: "Just whose interests were they out to protect?" The vast majority of the thousands of students at the rally came to Queen's Park to speak to the government with one voice and in one manner. For whatever reasons, they chose to demonstrate, did not try to occupy. I can say this with assurance because I saw them vote with their feet: the vast majority of students who came to Queen's Park did not go to push towards the barricades. These students have the right to choose to demonstrate peacefully, if that is their choice. A small minority does not have the right to change this decision: to try to force their way into the Legislature in the presence of peaceful demonstrators and so make a peaceful rally into something else. This right, the right of the vast majority of peaceful demonstrators to hold a rally their own way, is what I was trying to protect on the steps of Queen's Park on Thursday. If Phil Libman and the rest of the Varsity staff tip me off as to when they plan to return to occupy the Legislature they won't find me trying to stop them. This would not be consistent with the rationale I have just given. It should be clear then, that I was not seeking to protect the policemen or the Legislature, none of whom needed my protection. It is time for the Varsity to recognize that the student body has a right to make its own decisions even if the Varsity thinks that the resulting decisions are wrong. To attempt to subvert this right, even in the well-intentioned belief that your decision is better, cannot be justified.

GSU explains

In response to A. Mahon's further abridgement of "objective journalism", "Criticism of Editor not Valid; CUP Report", (Varsity, 15/3/78), and in response to J. Millard's letter to the editor (Varsity 17/3/78) which refers to the CUP Commission's findings, I would like to offer the Varsity's readers the following excerpts from that report.

1. "The Commission holds grave reservations over the editor's abilities and performance of her functions and responsibilities in regard to the financial management of the Grad Post."

2. "The Commission recognizes the right and the responsibility of the GSU Executive to respond to the content and quality of the Grad Post in their capacity as student representatives and as grad students themselves."

3. "The Commission finds itself unable to respond to questions of violations of the CUP statement of principles in the particulars case, primarily because it is our view that the present organizational structure of the Grad Post is contradictory to CUP principles in the first place."

In reference to the well worn charges of "personal and political" motivations on the part of the GSU Executive in their disciplinary actions of the Grad Post editor the Commission reported "it seems clear that no one is blameless in the situation, but we were unable to determine who, if anyone, deserved more blame than anyone else."

While the GSU Executive did cooperate with the CUP Commission, we did so only after protesting to CUP President Susan Johnson as to the means by which the Commission was constituted. "It is our concern that clause 101 of the constitution, which describes the process by which the members of the investigation commission would be chosen, is not in accord with standard procedure for establishing bodies of this type. It is our understanding that such commissions are chosen in one of two accepted fashions: either all parties to a dispute appoint the membership of the reviewing body or some mutually agreed upon neutral parties, unconnected to the actual dispute, appoint the membership of the reviewing body. Such practice is codified in all sections of the law which deal with arbitratable disputes between adversary parties. But clause 101 rejects both of these avenues for constituting such a body; it provides for only one party in the dispute to appoint the membership of the reviewing body." (Letter from GSU Executive to Susan Johnson, CUP President, 22/2/78).

The Varsity's readership has not been informed that two of the three CUP commissioners were chosen by individuals strongly biased against the GSU Executive, viz. the employee disciplined by the Executive and Eric McMillan, former editor of the Varsity and one who has had a long history of serious personal and political antagonisms with the GSU and its Executive. Our cooperation with the CUP Commission was not based upon the belief that the Commission was impartial, but on our conviction that should provide CUP with every opportunity to correct the problem themselves. Clearly, they have not chosen to do so.

It is true that we were partly disappointed in the Commission's findings, but it is not true that it painted the rosy picture which Mahon and others have alleged. Moreover, two of the five grounds offered for dismissal but rejected by the Commission were rejected on the grounds of insufficient evidence or explanation. We were never asked by the Commission for further evidence or explanation.

The following facts have also not been made known to the Varsity's readership. The Grad Post functions as a staff of one. To call for democratic process within the Grad Post is to give the Grad Post editor carte blanche control over the paper and the $18,000.00 graduate students invest in it through their fees. (It should be noted that this figure is roughly one-half of what SAC allocates for the three weekly Varsity. On the best of occasions the Grad Post is published every two weeks.) The editor of the Grad Post receives a salary of $238.10 per week.

We are convinced that if the CUP Commission's findings were wholly against the position of the GSU Executive, that the report would have been published in full, and would have had "front page" treatment. As it was, Mahon snuck in his biased report on page 8.

John Johnson
Treasurer, GSU

Editor's note: Andrew Mahon's article was not "buried" or "snuck in". Mr. Johnson certainly does not seem to have had any trouble finding it. Front page treatment on March 15 would have meant displacing material on the next day's demonstration.

GSU violations

I missed one "count" against the GSU executive when I listed their violations of the GSU constitution, in my letter to the Varsity ("Editorial Freedom").

The GSU executive has also failed to hold the constitutionally-mandated election "before March 31". With "at least one week" constitutionally required for nomination, and two days for the actual election (not to mention possible campaigning time), the GSU executive is already in gross violation of this bylaw.

In their agenda for tomorrow's 7:00 p.m. general council meeting at the GSU, the GSU executive cites as their excuse for not holding the elections on time, their failure to call an earlier general council meeting. That is to use one gross constitutional violation (the GSU has called only half of the minimum required council meetings this year) as an excuse for another gross constitutional violation.

The GSU executive has doubled the salaries of three of four officers for next year. They have, at the same time, put off elections to a time when the student newspapers are coming out only once a week, at most. They have put off elections to a time as well when people are usually preoccupied with end of the term work. They have put off elections, if their agenda is correct, to a Saturday.

There is a lot more wrong with student government over at the GSU than just the secret attacks on the Grad Post.

Cannot agree

I cannot agree with, much less understand Phil Libman's attack on Leo Casey, Jeremy Rudin and other students who prevented some demonstrators at the March 16 rally from storming the Legislature. I cannot imagine what purpose would have been served if the demonstration, otherwise a complete success, had degenerated into a battle with the police.

Entering the Legislature was necessary, Phil says, because Davis and Parrott "did not want to face an angry crowd of 8,000 students." Would they have been any more willing to have this angry crowd entering their premises? Clearly there would have been no hesitation to deploy the contingent of riot police standing guard for the specific purpose of preventing such action.

Phil asks, "What are these people afraid of? Bad press reaction? There is much more to fear from a riot than bad press. Aside from the obvious danger of injuries or deaths, violence could have precluded future demonstrations by giving the police an excuse to try to prevent them. In this regard, a violent demonstration could also have begotten more violent demonstrations. In other words what may have been prevented was the beginning of a long chain of ugly events which could only have resulted in the diversion of public consciousness from the issues and goals for which the

Self-examination

We were urged to take action with regard to cutbacks, in other words, to show our dissatisfaction. I'd like to suggest a different kind of action — a self-examination as to how we can be responsible students in a province facing a financial crisis. We should feel challenged to maintain the quality of our education in spite of cutbacks. Perhaps it will mean adapting our schedules to fit shorter library hours, making better use of less and older equipment, putting up with larger classes, financing our education with loans rather than grants, working harder for the same or less pay. Let's see how we, each personally and together, can help our province in this crisis.

Not my statement

I would like to correct a statement which you attribute to me regarding the occupation of Dr. Evans' office (Wednesday, March 15th). What appears under my name is not in accord with my statement to the Varsity. I had directed my comments solely at the issue of closing the university on the afternoon of the 16th, saying that in my view students would skip classes on that afternoon if the issue of cutbacks was important to them. I did not say that I was not in sympathy with the demands of those occupying the office. I am in sympathy with their demands and their actions, with the exception of the demand for the cancellation of classes. Demanding "permission to protest" is futile, and the only true reflection of student concern over cutbacks occurs when classes are not cancelled and students persist in protest.

Masada responds

In the last three weeks the Varsity has printed two similar letters critical of recent Masada magazine articles "Chimera in the Middle East" by R. Emmet Tyrell, Jr. (Masada Vol. 9 No. 1) and "Human Rights in the Middle East — An Examination of Slavery in the Arab World" by Mark Doidge and David Yanowski. (Masada Vol. 9 No. 2.)

In Mr Saab's letter (Varsity, March 3/78) the article by Mr. Tyrell was likened to "literature of the most rabid white power groups." This article first appeared in November 1976 in the well-known American monthly - Harper's Magazine. As well it was distributed by the Canadian Professors for Peace in the Middle East to its nine hundred members across Canada during last year's academic session. So much for Mr. Saab's "rabid white power groups"

Concerning the article on slavery Mr. Saab suggests that the authors attempt to discredit the Arabs by branding them indiscriminately as slave traders and brothel keepers. Neither brothels nor prostitutes are mentioned at all in the article, although most certainly slavery is. If the point of Mr. Saab's criticism is to show the article to be inaccurate, why is he so inaccurate in describing the contents of the article itself, to the point of actual invention?

Another point that both these gentlemen make is that some of the quotes are taken "out of context". In this case we agree with Mr. Saab's suggestion that our readers peruse the material itself, in full, to get as complete a picture as possible as to the true state of affairs. We suggest all of the books and articles cited in the notes as an excellent introduction to this subject.

This brings us to Mr. Saab's surprisingly provincial remark where he implies that because he was unable to "unearth" the Ghanaian "Weekly Spectator" or "Malawi Times" in the Roberts library, they must not exist!

If Mr. Saab is willing to divest himself of a naive assumption and venture beyond the card catalogue, he can obtain the relevant back issues of the above mentioned publications by writing the following addresses: The Weekly Spectator, Circulation Manager, 2638 Accra, Ghana. The Malawi Times, Circulation Manager, Private Bag No. 39, Dianiwe, Malawi.

Mr Bogue on his part also underestimates the scope of the author's sources. The picture of P 6 of the Masada article is certainly found on P.113 of Africa's Slaves Today by John Derrick as Mr Bogue says. He is also correct when he mentions that the caption in Derrick's book "contains no reference whatever to Arabs". However we would like to draw Mr Bogue's attention to a fascinating article in the Times of 19 April 1964, entitled "Photographers discover slavery in Nigeria". The picture in Masada, is one of a series of photos taken by a Signor Mauro Colasanti, an Italian reporter, while observing slave trading activities. The Times article describes his experiences and prints one of these series of photos, which is also found opposite P.115 of Derrick's book. The picture in the Times is by Signor Colasanti of the Times article can be seen by referring to P 6 of Derrick's book where acknowledgement is given.

The Times article quotes Mr. Colasanti remarking that, "the traders say the Arabs are their best customers. Many slaves in fact end up in Saudi Arabia."

Another perplexing allegation on the part of Mr. Bogue is that Sean O'Callaghan's book The Slave Trade is a "dubious" source "since the book is . . . utterly devoid of documentation." In this case we direct Mr. Bogue's attention to P.191 of O'Callaghan's book where he can peruse at his leisure the twenty-three title bibliography. As well we invite our critic to challenge the authenticity of Part IV of this book which is a reprint entitled "Slavery in Africa and Arabia", House of Lords, Extracts from Parliamentary Debate (Hansard), Official Report Vol 225, No 104

Finally Messieurs Saab and Bogue suggest that the references are "out of date". It is true that these references span the time period from 1961 to 1977. At what particular date do our critics suggest that the discussion begin?

The evidence shows conclusively that slavery still exists in the Arab World. The most powerful testimony to this fact is found in Eldridge Cleaver's "Statement from Prison", Oakland, California, January 1976, in which he proclaims "... I have seen such slaves with my own eyes."

Alberta cutback rally attracts 5000

EDMONTON (CUP) — About 5,000 Alberta students and staff demonstrated their opposition to tuition increases and inadequate government funding of education in a March 15 rally.

They chanted, "We won't pay more for less" and gathered on the steps of the Alberta legislature here to demand that the government loosen the public purse strings to ease the financial pressure that has led to tuition increases and cutbacks in services which have eroded the quality of education.

But a debate on the floor of the legislature immediately following the protest showed that the cries fell on deaf ears.

The crowd of marchers stretched for more than a mile and tied up traffic on the High Level Bridge, the largest in the city.

From the steps of the legislature, premier Peter Lougheed told protesters in a brief speech, interrupted by boos and chanting, that there were two issues: the matter of government funding of education and the level of tuition fees.

He told them that taxpayers pay 87 per cent of the University of Alberta's operating budget and that tuition in Alberta, a province with good employment opportunities, was among the lowest in the country.

This was answered by the crowd with a thunderous chanting of "Bullshit, bullshit, bullshit."

Lougheed said he was impressed with a brief on tuition increases prepared by march organizers, and told the crowd that his government would re-examine the provincial student aid program. When he said that the students were demanding taxpayers pay a greater portion of the costs of their education, the protesters shouted back "Yes, right on," and chanted "We pay taxes too."

After Lougheed's speech, Federation of Alberta Students executive member Brian Mason was led to the line of police officers cordoning off the steps to the microphones. He told the demonstrators the government's statements were inaccurate and that students across the country are protesting punitive Government spending on education.

He said the restrictive spending in Alberta was part of a federal government policy of restrictive spending for all social services, and pointed out that it was by the premier's own admission that the Alberta student aid system "stinks."

U of Alberta president Harry Gunning drew the greatest round of applause when he told the students and staff that their interest in the quality of education and their protest march had generated meetings between the government and universities and had an impact on the day's debate in the legislature. "You have demonstrated true concern, and nothing but good can come of it."

Harry Midgely of the Alberta human rights and civil liberties commission described the U of A board of governors as a "row of extinct volcanoes" for its failure to support the university general faculties council and Gunning. Gunning, who announced earlier his intention to march with students from the U of A to the legislature, did not after the board voted against his participation in the march.

Tuzyk's term: problems...solutions?

By ANDREW MAHON

As SAC president John Tuzyk relinquishes his chair to former vice-president and stripper with the FBI, Brian "baby-face" Hill, there are a number of issues which he can describe, apparent to him even before he took office.

"We knew from the word go that money was a problem," says Tuzyk, "because last year's council recommended a fees referendum. But we weren't aware of what else would come up during that year to interfere with that problem."

Other things on Tuzyk's mind when he ran for SAC president in '77 were student aid and alienation of people from professional faculties from SAC. "We also knew we'd have to deal with the larger question of involvement," explains Tuzyk, pointing to his campaign brochure with the infamous "12-point plan" (A list of twelve issues which Tuzyk outlined in his campaign platform last year).

Surprise, Surprise

However, there were a number of surprises awaiting Tuzyk during his eventful year. "What surprised me the most this year was a demonstration where there were easily a thousand people from the U of T."

According to Tuzyk, the student council has the job of making posters and advising all students societies well in advance, advertising in The Varsity and doing a tabloid. "But you can do all that and still not predict the result".

"It's a very spontaneous thing," says Tuzyk. "The student council makes people aware of the issues involved but at the final level, it's the people's gut reactions that count."

"You can only alert people to what's happening and put some positive things forward, deal with their questions — but you can't talk them into going. That's what I learned this year."

SAC's profile as it is seen by students has been a continual cause for concern for Tuzyk. "Perhaps we give too much of the impression of a competent well-organized bureaucracy", admits Tuzyk; "what you try to do is break down SAC into its component parts and get people plugged in to a very specific area." Tuzyk explains that a lot of people got involved through the student aid committee, or through the services commission.

Tuzyk no bureaucrat

There have been some distinct problems, according to Tuzyk, with SAC this year. "The essential problem with SAC stems from its essential advantages — SAC does a lot of different things and we represent 26,000 different people. All these people have different interests and concerns, and we're trying to deal with all of them."

"We're dealing with so many things," explains Tuzyk, "that the problem is getting a spot on the agenda both in a real and philosophical sense, and sometimes when someone comes in the front door with an idea, we haven't been able to respond as quickly as I would have liked."

Tuzyk refutes the concept of a "student bureaucrat" (a term bandied about by presidential candidate Tom Simpson during his ill-fated campaign to "take the hack out of SAC").

"We entered this year with certain objectives in mind — but it's very easy to get elected on not much of a platform. I could be very busy doing nothing but answering my phone all day, but you have to go ahead with clear objectives, and I think that's the best way to avoid becoming a bureaucracy."

Another hot item at the SAC offices these days is the fees referendum (which was defeated) and its consequences.

Tuzyk points out that there were a lot of major concerns happening

The Varsity — Howard Deane

Tuzyk will return to law school next year, and says he will write for the Varsity, former home of other 'hacks'.

simultaneously when the question of the fees referendum came up.

"We said okay, the quality of education is a very important item, we have to work on it, and the demonstration is a very significant item; let's work on it and let's hope and pray that the fees referendum tumbles into place afterwards — but it didn't quite tumble."

Around that time, the occupation at Simcoe Hall also provoked a controversial reaction from the SAC offices. But Tuzyk attributes this controversy to SAC's nature. "SAC will be innately controversial no matter what happens", states Tuzyk. "It so happened that 12 people marched into Evans' office and the demands they made were coincident (for the large part) with ours — that was the situation, it was a given, and we had to try and have those demands resolved with the administration."

Through all the issues and problems of his term, it is apparent to Tuzyk that there must be a constant process of re-evaluation. "I think SAC goes through a constant process of re-evaluation. SAC is a dynamic process — what we're doing now has no real relation to what we were doing three years ago or what we'll probably be doing three years from now."

Tuzyk, ace reporter?

Tuzyk emphasizes that the change is going to come from the feedback received from the students — both in terms of the people they elect to SAC and the feedback they give to SAC members.

Next year's president will be immediately confronted with resolving the financial situation. "That's a headache", admits Tuzyk. "Next year, I think we're going to be pre-occupied with doling out diminishing resources, and that's unfortunate, but we're going to have to come to some resolution or it will take up too much time."

For Tuzyk, it will be a matter of returning to Law School for his second year and working at The Varsity. But Tuzyk appears satisfied with some of his accomplishments. "We weren't just going to react from decisions coming out of Simcoe Hall and Queen's Park, says Tuzyk. "We wanted to involve as many people as possible in the decision-making process."

"I was really happy at the number of people we got involved both in terms of SAC reps and also non-SAC reps," concludes the retiring president. "I think the challenge for SAC next year is to get more people involved and change and react as quickly as possible to new demands."

How to speak to a genuine SAC hack

By ANDREW MAHON and HEATHER HILL

SAC aficionados ("hacks") speak a unique argot forged from endless committee meetings, reams of commission reports, visions of eternal empires and pieces of broken dreams. Listed below are some of the expressions necessary for understanding the oral tradition of this rare but hardy breed (homo saciens):

- bozo — a fanatically right-wing SAC member or student politician in general (e.g. Brian O'Riordan).
- bizarro — a fanatically left-wing student politician (e.g. Mario Cutajar).
- blast-off — SAC members use this verb when they mean "go" or "leave."
- blowout — an ambiguous word that can mean both good and bad. The negative etymology usually refers to an event with a large budget deficit; the positive to a successful event or achievement.
- do a hammer — severely criticize a fellow SAC member at a commission, board or executive meeting. Historical "hammers" have taken the form of extreme humiliation of a peer, often in budgetary terms.
- commander — the leader or head of a campus organization.
- mega-commander — U of T president John Evans.
- megabuck — the SAC student fees collected every September. SAC coffers don't contain dollars, they contain megabucks.
- macroservices — as a result of reduced financing for next year, SAC's financial chieftains fear macroservices, the inverse relationship between the money SAC receives from its students and the money it relinquishes to services.
- megapanning — long-range (or short-range) planning for projects. The Campus as Campus Centre, for example, has been megaplanned for the past 25 years.
- bureaucrat — the pipe-smoker and desk-sitter who keeps the mighty paper machine of SAC running smoothly. Bureaucrats don't participate in the tribal warfare of SAC; their function is to record them.

Hill faces uphill financial struggle

By HEATHER HILL

SAC's president-elect may have beaten his opponent handily in the recent student council elections, but he wasn't able to spark the interest that was shown in the referendum on the proposed SAC fee increase.

Brian Hill, a fourth-year History student at Scarborough College, won the race by a decisive 2,200-1,043 vote margin, but more than 200 people came out to vote "No" to the proposed $4 SAC fee increase and ignored the names of the presidential hopefuls on the same ballot.

Hill, who served as vice-president to John Tuzyk this year, interpreted the figures as "a definite sign that in a time of tight money people knew at least that they didn't want to pay out more. It's easier to decide that you don't want to pay more money, than who you want for SAC president."

The former SAC representative for Scarborough College felt the interest in the SAC elections was neither more nor less than last year. Hill said the slight drop in voters from last year was due to the diversion from this year's voting of other student governors, nonetheless claimed that "hacks alone didn't win the election." While he admitted that Simpson didn't have the support of "the St. Mike's College Student Union, the Scarborough College Student Council, and the Vic College Students' Administrative Council," he also asserted that "we worked for 10 days solid . . . at Scarborough College I spoke in over 150 classes."

Hill added that John Tuzyk's campaign last year contained less of this "anti-SAC" platform than in any other year "because we didn't need to. We put forward a positive 14-point platform."

John Tuzyk didn't have to work very hard to win, but in Hill's opinion he is "the best president we've had in memory in SAC. I only hope I can measure up to him," said Hill fervently. "It's rough coming after him."

But new brooms still like to sweep clean, and Hill wants SAC to re-examine its priorities in education: "I mean watching the quality of education at U of T and taking a Tuzyk is "the best president we've had in memory in SAC."

the Queen's Park demonstration; the lower winning margin this year is explicable in terms of the "joke ticket" that ran against Tuzyk last year, he added.

Hill does feel, however, that he conducted a "more positive" campaign than has been seen in previous years of SAC elections, perhaps even a "more honest" one. "If you look at the campaign of the last four years, you can see that the presidents ran on an anti-SAC campaign," said Hill. He cited Seymour Kanowitch, Gord Barnes, and Shirley French as former SAC presidents who all used this "ploy to gain votes."

"I think you have to attack SAC if you're going to run," said Hill. "Otherwise people will wonder why you're running if you don't want to change things."

Hill said the anti-SAC platforms "have always been phoney attacks. It's just a political ploy. They (the former presidents) were part of the system. They had all the members of the SAC executive themselves."

Hill, who was frequently accused by opponent Tom Simpson during the elections of being just another one of the "SAC hacks," said he didn't attack SAC because "I didn't want to hurt the organization, I wanted to improve on it."

Hill, who just as frequently in his campaigning paraded the endorsements he had received from stronger stand in guarding that quality."

He wants to tighten the ties between SAC and the course unions on campus "to work together with them to solve the problems." Students need to have their consciousness raised in regard to cutbacks, Hill said; he wants to get them to fight.

The activism Hill has in mind takes the form of pamphlets, classroom speaking and co-opting of interested students into cutbacks committees and course unions. "It is difficult," acknowledged Hill, but he cited the success of similar committees formed just this year at Ryerson. "We should go over and find out how they set them up," says Hill.

Hill says that he personally supported the occupation by 12 students and faculty of U of T president John Evans' office last week and that he disapproved of the knee-jerk approach the SAC executive took in their statement on it ("... we essentially endorse . . ."). He said that the executive tends to follow the feeling of the entire council, which by rights should rule SAC. But in this case they were wrong, he said.

How active then should students be? "Before we move ahead we have to make sure the students are behind us," says Hill. He is in favor of more mass demonstrations if they are required to show the government or the university administration that students aren't satisfied. He feels the March 16 demonstration at Queen's Park was largely successful: "We achieved our goals. The demonstration was a reasonable one. It wasn't violent, it was a demonstration of your normal students."

Students today have to be "very active," reaffirmed Hill. "If they're not, they're going to have their modest gains made in the past taken away from them. They have to stand up and be counted or else the government will run all over them."

Hill, an aspiring high school teacher, was once a member in good standing of the political party he criticizes. He has been accused of dropping his membership in the Young Progressive Conservative Party prior to his 1976 campaign for vice-president to avoid "political embarrassment"; Hill said he dropped out "well before I became a vice-president and I don't remember the exact date. 'My involvement with the party has had no effect on me as a student politician. I dropped it because I wanted people to evaluate me for the policies I put forward, not the policies of the party."

"I didn't want people saying, 'Hill is voting that way because he's a Tory.'" He said that he has voted against Harry Parrott in SAC meetings and against the new student aid proposals. He added that during the elections he received the endorsement of "people who were high-ranking members of the NDP and the Liberal party."

cutbacks and poor student aid — "campaigns that I can't solve in a single year."

A major stumbling block next year has been created by the defeat of the fees referendum, says Hill. He says the reduced financing will seriously affect programs, and require cutbacks in research into cutbacks and education. Next year, he fears, SAC may have to reduce the level of its services (films, concerts, pubs, speakers and so on) for lack of funding.

Hill also sees a fierce fight with Governing Council shaping up. He feels that unless the Macdonald Report (the five-year external review of Governing Council) is opposed, it will cut off any "meaningful debate at the university." Hill is hoping that the government appointees, to council, "if they have any wits," as well as students and alumni, will go against it to prevent the power of the decision-making body from being shifted wholly to the office of the president.

But the most difficult battle, according to Hill, is with the students themselves: "Apathy is the biggest." He correspondingly sees his major goal in "opening SAC up to students," getting them more involved.

Hill says he didn't get his taste for the public arena from his involvement with the Young Progressive Conservatives, although he worked for the party in two federal elections. He was initiated into political life in high school, where he worked with his student council, and it is to high school that next year's SAC president intends to return. He realizes that he will have to wait for a few years to realize his ambition of teaching history or geography but says that is where his heart lies.

"I ran for SAC (in 1975) because I thought my money was being wasted," said Hill. "I wanted to change things." Three years later he readily admits that "by the end of next year I'll be sick of politics."

Besides, Hill says, "student politics don't lead to the P.M.O. (Prime Minister's Office). Who outside of a university would vote for a student council president? Outside the university I'd be regarded as a radical. My changes for success would be less. I'll make my mark here and move on to other fields," says Hill.

SUMMING UP

Throughout the 1977/78 year students have expressed their concern about changes in the student aid policy, lack of university funding, and government inactivity regarding the unemployment crisis. We at SAC have heard from you about the annoyances and worries which we all share.

The biggest issue on everyone's mind over the year has involved student aid and government funding. The most encouraging sign to people working at SAC has been that more and more students have joined this fight, determined to get a better shake from the legislature. It takes a lot of effort to cause a positive effect, but we have all made a very substantial beginning.

SAC is proud of its financial management record for 1977-78. Running an operation such as the Students' Administrative Council is a large task; we hope you agree that we have spent your money wisely and well. SAC is also pleased with the growth of our services — in particular those services that have been expanded to the suburban campuses. Well over 100,000 people attended SAC Service events. 27,000 went to Con Hall Concerts, 22,000 attended the SAC free films, 10,000 enjoyed the SAC pubs, and another 10,000 took part in the Roam Arounds. We are happy with the higher profile SAC has maintained this year and believe that the continued flow of honest dialogue between SAC and its friends as well as its foes will help the Students' Administrative Council maintain this high level of consistent improvement.

SAC is thankful for having seen so many people come in to offer themselves, their ideas, and their energies. It is our hope that 1977/78 has seen the first small, but much needed, break in student apathy — an apathy which has had a firm hold on campus life for far too many years now.

Plans are now being made for next year. We hope that in 1977/78 we served you well and brought the student point of view to the fore. We are sure that the momentum we have generated will continue to pick up steam.

Thanks for a great year!

He's cute and he's almost KISS. Yes, this is Arthur Kaptainis, next year's Review Editor. Here we see him back in grade 9, a rare and candid shot without his glasses. We'd say something funny about him, but he's going to be our boss soon.

This is Lotta Bug, the ant-eater lady from the CNE's midway. "I'll raise you two cockroaches to one grasshopper." She plays Diana Rigg in the new film A Little Night Music. Turn to page 12 for a review.

Praise the Lord! Here we have Ezekiel, the world's most prominent Christian transvestite. Born without a single hair on his body, he prayed for a miracle and was rewarded with a coat of gecko skin. Now he tours as Sally Mander, the lizard queen with the Tubes, a wholesome rock band. See page 18 for a review of his band's new double live album.

Lou Reed's Street Hassle, there's two sides to this album

Your loved one just left you. You feel depressed. So you go home and drink a bit and cry a bit. Perhaps a little bit of music? Ninety-five per cent of you feel sorry for yourself so you pick Hotel California by the Eagles. If so, stop reading this article.

The other five per cent feel like knifing their ex, so you would probably pick something by Lou Reed. His latest, Street Hassle, might do the trick; it's music to plan an axe-murder by.

What could be better than toasting your ex with a song called "Dirt" where the refrain goes "that's all you're worth; you're just cheap, cheap, cheap, cheap uptown dirt." The man is a poet. Forget about Springsteen; he's just another pinball fanatic from New Jersey. Forget about Patti Smith; she's just another ugly little girl who has the hots for Keith Richards. Forget about that fat cat Jagger. Lou Reed is the queen of the streets.

For all of you who are really psychopathic, decadent creatures of the night, Street Hassle is your album. Reed sounds like Brian Ferry on acid and writes like the Big Apple's answer to Jean Genet.

Street Hassle was recorded live, but most of it was done using a new stereo binaural process that does indeed make it difficult to tell whether it is live or Memorex.

The musicians involved are all regular Reed henchmen. It's not your average drums, bass, and guitar sound. Instead each instrument goes its own way: the drums sound flat and the bass has nothing to do with the beat. They combine to form a metallic wall of sound. All in all, it makes for some bizarre music that is as hypnotically compelling as a chainsaw.

Side one centres around the title song, a three part opus dealing with street life. There's a pick-up, sex, payment, and a death. The sweet sounding strings leitmotif at the beginning becomes a harsh bass line at the end as the two characters impassionately discuss how to get rid of the corpse. It's pure theatre and it's the best song Reed's done in this line since "Berlin".

Side two is comprised of a melange of styles. "I Wanna Be Black" demonstrates Reed's wry sense of humour over a jazzy backdrop. Following that is "Real Good Time Together" which sounds like the collaboration between Brian Eno and Bob Fripp. The other three songs mark a return to the compressed musical sound which dominates the first side.

Street Hassle is a record for Reed aficionados and for them it's a must. If you've been wondering why Reed's voice gets whinier and his guitar tinnier on each album, buy Street Hassle. It's taken him three attempts, but this time he's done it right: a strange, searing and painful look at life on the streets.

con

Way back when, before the days of punk rock, Brian Eno and The Rocky Horror Picture Show, the only person you could consistently turn to for some detached, surrealistic sleaze, was a Mr. Lou Reed. Lou, late and great of the much-vaunted Velvet Underground, could be counted on for an album and a persona a year, each being related to the previous only by an over-riding sense of debauched, bored cool.

But something has gone awry. Lou's last album Rock'n'Roll Heart was a patch work of hastily written serio-morbo tunes that only reached the level of mediocre. One had the feeling that Lou's ability to write a song in three minutes had gotten the better of his common sense. And that unfortunate trend is continued and elaborated on in his latest work, Street Hassle.

Recorded in binaural sound (it's too boring to explain — suffice to say that when you listen to it on headphones the sound is more realistic than standard stereo) this disc is an uneasy collection of live and studio cuts. All the songs are poorly mixed, several badly played and some just not worth the effort. "Gimmie Some Good Times" is catchy, "We're Going To Have" is a cute remake of an old Velvet's tune and "Leaf Me Alone" drive along, sorta, but the rest are sleepers. And to make matters worse, Lou has forsaken self-restraint and replaced wryly implied vices with lines like, "that bitch will never fuck again". Trite Lou, trite.

In the end you're left with the impression that Lou wrote and recorded this thing during the intermission of The Incredible Melting Man. And that film doesn't have an intermission. Binaural sound is a sweet gimmick, but it's no excuse for this mess. So you're still my hero, Lou, but don't push it.

Everything you ever wanted to know about boys...

Scavullo on Men by Francesco Scavullo. Random House, $18.95.

Precisely it's possible that the interview is the dip-stick of literary forms. Useful for gauging the level of the oil in a well-known personality. It is a messy form that produces, at best, a little slick off an articulate subject's thought, at worst, a stain on the rag and the earth of the audience's understanding. Certainly that's true of the interview when employed by a fashion consultant like Francesco Scavullo who is asking selected major novelists, actors, singers, politicians and political theorists about their ideas on sex and good grooming.

I got this book because I'm fascinated by some of the people featured, but I'm considerably less fascinated with them than I was before. It's one thing for Craig Claiborne, food editor of the New York Times, to say in answer to the question, "What's your major indulgence?" "I'm afraid it's sex. But I'm celibate in Europe because they don't wash there." Or Arthur Miller saying, "I'm one of the original haters of TV." Or most of the subjects in this book making the kind of vacuous remarks that earn people places in the glitter parade of George Gamster's Names in the News.

But I have a certain respect, rapidly eroding, it's true, for Mick Jagger, and to hear him say in answer to the question, "Is spirituality important to you?" "Spirituality is important to everyone" just turns a little thicker and greyer the sludge in my liver. I genuinely and greatly admire Norman Mailer, and he's in this too. In answer to a question about the movies, he says, "Oh I love the movies. I especially love porn films. The sleazos. I try to make it about twice a month." Okay. I think important thinkers are entitled to their vices. But a remark like that does nothing to illuminate possibly obscure passages in Of a Fire on the Moon at all. And you know, it's tiring.

Better than seventy per cent of the people in this book have no ideas worth exploring, and those that do, don't in the interviews. And it's damn disheartening to discover how vacuous an actor as fine as Alan Bates for example can be when he's asked half a dozen uninspiring questions and invited to run on into the mike through half a dozen wordy and uninspired answers.

The only interesting interviews in this book are with people I've never heard of before, such as a French street-singer-actor-acrobat who lives by his wits in Paris, Philippe Petit, and he's interesting because I know nothing at all about him and those few supervisory insights on interview gives can make a compelling enough introduction to a truly remarkable personality whom one has not had the fortune to meet otherwise.

Petit really is fascinating. He does street juggling, mime, and acrobatics on the high-wire in a kind of street-theatre he has been performing since he was fifteen. In all of this he is creating a persona. "I am interested in this character that I create, to make him more open, to enrich him — this guy with a top hat and a unicycle." He is working on projects for international circuses, for films, all from the very narrow home base of the streets of Paris. Very compelling but if I'd known anything about him before or seen his act it's likely I would find his treatment as superficial as those of others interviewed in the book whom I know better and admire.

But it's very dull to meet somebody you've known before in more rigorous contexts, posed before you in a Vogue style slicked-over magazine photo beside three pages of warmed-over print representing their incidental opinions on nothing of consequence. Or as Talleyrand once remarked wittily, "Yes."

Gigantic spheres sing at night

If you watch Frankie Avalon and Annette Funicello movies on Saturday afternoons, if Rock Hudson is your idea of a real hunk, if you know the name of the movie in which Eve Arden said to Rita Hayworth, "Got man trouble honey?" — yes even if you suffer from these lapses of taste I defy you to like A Little Night Music.

Director Harold Prince's latest film, A Little Night Music is based on the Broadway musical of the same name, which in turn is based on Ingmar Bergman's 1955 film, Smiles of a Summer Night. Bergman's film has been described as an "exquisite carnal comedy" in which "boudoir farce becomes lyric poetry."

Unfortunately, when the American musical tradition, in the persons of Harold Prince and Stephen Sondheim, and screenwriter Hugh Wheeler, is imposed on the delicate balance of the original film the results are both pathetic and ludicrous.

Elizabeth Taylor, looking like the victim of an over-enthusiastic Mark Eden developer (you keep expecting her to say "After I added a full 8 inches to my bust with Mark Eden, I no longer envy other girls"), plays an aging actress, Desiree Armfeldt. All the men in the film are gaga over her (Len Cariou drools whenever she is around). Their fascination with her may be incomprehensible to seventies sensibilities; one feels that one has overlooked a footnote in Freud on mega-breast fetishes in Viennese men at the turn of the century.

Lawrence Guttard and Diana Rigg as Count Carl-Magnus and his wife seem to be the only people enjoying themselves in the film. Even that great scene stealer Hermione Gingold as the old Mrs. Armfeldt is reduced to trying to inject innuendo into paraphrases of Oscar Wilde such as "To lose a lover is a vexation, but to lose one's teeth is a catastrophe."

It is necessary to mention Christopher Guard who plays Len Cariou's divinity student son, but this is only because he has the best line in the film: "I wish I had been one of the spermatozoa that never made it to the womb." Beat that for adolescent angst! He also announces, in the middle of a fancy dinner party, "Life makes me want to vomit!" (An early punk rocker perhaps?) In a film which appears to be dedicated to the proposition that a schnapps before and a cigarette after are the three best things in life, he seems to be out of place.

"Ach du lieber Siegfried! I said shoot pool, not shoot the fool."

Leslie Anne Downe plays Len Cariou's eighteen year old bride. She is still a virgin after eleven months. This leads to dialogue of this genre: "You mean?", "Yes, still . . ." "Oh no" "You mean?" "Oh God, no wonder you . . ." "Yes I . . . knew you" and so on.

Although other reviewers have led one to believe that the film is a let down from the musical (which was plastered with Tony's I think the whole conception springs from Middle America's need for wholesome, sterile family entertainment. As well they say that Elizabeth Taylor's singing is execrable. Her song, "Send in the Clowns" was the emotional high point of an otherwise embarrassingly laden film — at least for me. But then I always got C. plus in music appreciation.

New Wave Disney flic

Yes, times have changed. Remember when Disney films were all about a pet cat or a runaway goat? Those days have come and gone. Nowadays a Disney film involves molecular mobilization, flying saucers, kidnappers, extortion, and teenage gang warfare. That's right, Return From Witch Mountain has all this and more.

The story centres around Tia and Tony, two kids from a strange settlement on Earth named Witch Mountain. Their unique talent involves molecular mobilization, (telekinesis in other words). Anyway, on a visit to the big city, Tony is kidnapped by a mad professor and an evil old lady. Tia enlists the aid of the Earthquake gang, four minuscule truants, to find her talented sibling. It's all action from there on.

Like every other Disney film Return From Witch Mountain has the usual quota of has-been stars. This time it's Christopher Lee and Bette Davis, both of whom should have expired gracefully years ago. The kids are all healthy and clean-cut, the usual loathsome Disney type.

The highlight of the film is a car chase in which the talented toddlers use their powers to throw trucks, buses, vans, etc. in the path of the pursuers. It's no Bullitt, but apparently involved sixteen stuntmen. The kids in the audience nyuked it up and even the token adults woke up for it.

If you have any diminutive relatives or little loved ones, Return From Witch Mountain could be just what you need. It's a fine example of '78 Disney, which is worlds apart from the kiddie flics with which you and I grew up.

Souvairan a musician first

"The characteristic of the movement of course is the wide gap between bass and treble, between the right and the left hand, and a moment comes, an utterly extreme situation, when the poor little motif seems to hover alone and forsaken above a giddy yawning abyss — a procedure of awe-inspiring unearthliness, to which then succeeds a distressful making-of-itself-small, a start of fear as it were, that such a thing could happen."

So writes Serenus Zeitblom in Thomas Mann's Doctor Faustus, in a description of the second movement of Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 111. He writes also of the "idyllic innocence" of the Arietta theme, and it is perhaps this feature, along with the "awe-inspiring unearthliness" that is a hallmark of late Beethoven. This apparent paradox was well brought out in last Sunday's concert by Pierre Souvairan, in the final concert of the Hart House Sunday evening series. In a way this was a farewell concert for Prof. Souvairan, too, as he retires from the University's Faculty of Music at the end of the academic year.

THE DIFFICULT APPEARS EASY

The program was a solid one, favouring repertoire that Souvairan has either recorded or performed in concert previously. The two Beethoven works — the Bagatelles, Op. 126, and the Sonata, Op. 111, provided a roast-beef opening to the program, and both works received a careful and thoughtful performance. It is characteristic of Souvairan's playing that he is able to make the difficult appear easy, tackling the more ferocious passages of the Sonata with seeming effortlessness and noticeable lack of flashy gesturing. There were some magical moments in the Bagatelles, a group of six lyrical pieces, ironic in their simplicity. The pastoral quality of some of the pieces, with suitable drone bass-line and disarmingly artless melodies was especially well-interpreted, particularly in the final two pieces of the set. It is evident that Souvairan is indeed fond of these pieces, as he chose the first one as an encore.

No less sensitive was Souvairan's treatment of the vicissitudes of Op. 111. There is "bagatellian innocence" here to be sure, but there is also the "awe-inspiring unearthliness" which strikes in the second movement. Souvairan brought a forthright interpretation to the brusque first movement, giving a clear and precise performance of the rushing passages and fugati which pepper its development. There were some beautiful moments in the closing movement, and Souvairan handled the insistent trill passages with a clarity which allowed the "unearthliness" to remain unmarred.

CONTRASTING STYLES

The second half of the program was dominated by the Symphonic Etudes of Schumann, a composer favoured in many of Souvairan's programmes. This, along with the Chopin Fourth Ballade in F Minor, allowed Souvairan to demonstrate various different aspects of pianistic writing. Both writing at about the same time, Chopin and Schumann are about as disparate in their styles of writing as it was possible to be, and the contrasts were clear in Souvairan's performance. The gentle berceuse-like rhythm of the Ballade, which eventually becomes a frightening snarl of double-third and octave passages posed no real difficulties for Souvairan, who approached them with suitable energy. The Schumann on the whole was more effective because of its more manifold contrasts in tone and technique. It was here that one became aware of Schumann's dynamic writing for the piano, from the bravura of the difficult fifth variation to the haunting harmonies of the penultimate one. The final Allegro Brillante was suitably exuberant, abounding in persistent dotted rhythms and piled-up sequences which lend excitement to the final pages.

Souvairan chose to conclude the concert with Debussy's Isle Joyeuse, a virtuoso number bound to leave both performer and audience breathless. This was a clear, unclouded performance of a difficult work, rich in impressionistic harmony and idiomatic figuration. Souvairan also chose Debussy for his second encore, again selecting a work in contrast — the Brayeres from the second book of Preludes. A fitting close, for in it Souvairan demonstrated that one need not make a virtuoso performance out of a piece which demands simplicity and only that. It seems that often performers with flashy technique choose to show it off at all times, and perhaps the mark of a truly sensitive artist is an instinctive placement of the music before virtuosity. A platitude, yes, but we need more artists like Souvairan who put it into practice.

ENGINEERING GRADUATES CAREERS IN MANUFACTURING

Procter & Gamble's corporate success stems from the quality of the people in its organization. The company moves ahead only as it succeeds in attracting individuals who think in new and stimulating ways. We are in constant need of people who combine imagination and initiative, who act with energy and self-confidence, and who challenge present thinking and procedures. Most important are basic intelligence, leadership, healthy ambition and a strong team spirit.

We are seeking individuals interested in professional and personal growth to be trained initially as:

PROJECT MANAGERS,
PRODUCTION SUPERVISORS, STAFF COST SUPERVISORS,
STAFF CHEMICAL MANAGERS.

Your university degree may be in any field of engineering or honours chemistry. Currently, Mechanical Engineers are of particular interest.

Additional information is available in the placement office in our information finder or in the UCPA Careers book or by writing to me.

Please indicate your interest by sending your resumé or UCPA job application, including an indication of area of interest and a summary of your academic and other achievements. Replies will be treated in confidence and should be directed to:

Diplomat's novelistic diary is gently ironic

AN APPETITE FOR LIFE: The Education of a Young Diplomat by Charles Ritchie. Macmillan. $10.95.

Diaries are certainly among the most interesting, and most neglected, literary forms in the English language. As expressions of "real life" they have rarely been considered worthy of full-fledged literary analysis, despite the fact that they possess aspects of structure and convention that are readily comparable to those found in the novel.

An Appetite for Life, the diary of Canadian diplomat Charles Ritchie's young years, is an excellent example of a fine literary mind taking up the stuff of daily experience and transforming it, by a process of selection and expansion, into art.

The diary moves swiftly through an untrammelled series of vignettes, first in Halifax and then at Oxford, in much the same manner, albeit on a more restrained scale, as many picaresque novels. The comic hero is Ritchie himself. Through his eyes we see his mother, stern and compassionate; and the disdainful Katherine, whom Ritchie loves and wants to marry. We witness the arrival of the du Plat Taylors, English in the worst sense of the word, who come to Newfoundland to tame the new world and soon return to England, daunted but unabashed. And then, in the second half of the diary, we meet the Oxford group — the charming Jeremy, the tactless Anstruther-Gray and, of course, Margot, to whom Ritchie loses his virginity.

The characters are out of a novel and yet they are part of this man's past. All are filtered through his remarkably sensitive mind and our final impression is of a somewhat irreverent, rather awkward young man possessed of an uncanny innocence. Ritchie's is not the innocence of naivete, however; rather, it is a great ability to appreciate all people for their own sake without judging them, damning or praising them.

An Appetite for Life is an extremely personal book. Politics and reflections on "larger concerns" are not to be found here. Despite the lack of profundity, however, the account is so much a part of its time in its portrayal of both Halifax and Oxford, that it may be read and appreciated as a quasi-historical document.

The leisured twenties imbue the Oxford section. The young collegians and their various women are caught up in the whole round of new dances, motor cars, drink, smoke and outrageous pranks; and yet at no time do we feel faced with an empty stereotype of the jazz age.

Halifax, bastion of the Empire, Protestant, up-standing and bigoted in the extreme, is also somewhat in evidence in the first section; but its influence is mitigated by that of Ritchie's mother, and by Ritchie himself. Although he is by no means a rebel, he does expose the pretensions of those who surround him and the absurdities of his time and place with a gentle, self-effacing humour.

Ritchie goes after one of those British cuties. Would you lose your virginity in the back seat of this jalopy?

An Appetite for Life defies easy definition as a diary. While reading it one must constantly remind oneself that this is not the vibrant creation of a novelist's mind but is, in fact, the recreated experience of one young man in the early part of the twentieth century.

Live Dead still dead, of corpse

Concert films are usually directed at small, specific audiences. Transferring a concert to film robs the original event of ninety per cent of its excitement, the only people who really enjoy them are the maniacal fans of the band in question. Just try to tell a confirmed Zep fan that The Song Remains the Same was a ponderous piece of nonsense that only served to highlight that band's considerable faults. He'll rip your heart out.

Well, the latest in the seemingly never-ending succession of concert films has hit town, and this time the group to be immortalised in the preserving amber of celluloid is the Grateful Dead. Now immediately, several questions come to mind. First, no matter how much you love the Dead, you've got to admit that their stage presence, and therefore their visual potential on film, is slightly less than overpowering. Secondly, the Dead relies heavily on their monstrous sound system. There's no way that a film is going to catch the impact of their live sound. Finally, the Dead had their day around the turn of the decade. A film of one of their monstrous Woodstockish concerts, where everyone was too ruined to see, would have at least some historical interest. This film was taken at a concert performed well after their heyday.

So what is the answer to all these questions? A boring, poorly mixed anachronism. One is mildly diverted by the band's ability not to move for about forty minutes. The second half of the film, however, which is comprised of one of the Dead's twenty minute long "acid rock" (surely the most self-indulgent and boring form of rock ditties), is enough to make the mildest film goer assault the ushers. The between-song interviews of zulued, thirtish flower children mumbling, "they're great, man, you know? Really great, like the greatest, man", is the most persuasive piece of anti-sixties propaganda ever to touch the silver screen. And to top it all off, the flick opens with an overly long psychedelic-spaced-out-acid-trip-Yellow-Submarine animation sequence that is both poorly conceived and repetitious.

But then, maybe I'm not the one to judge. The twenty-seven year old lummoxy with the four foot long pig-tails and the embroidered overalls that sat behind me in a cloudbank of vegetable smoke laughed uproariously at the animation ("oh wow, man, blue") and applauded every time the camera moved. When I left he was still shouting for an encore. And he should know. I mean, he's a fan, man.

Australia sends us their dingoes

Sherbet, Australia's most prolific rock group, played the Ryerson Theatre Saturday night and only a few people knew about it; even fewer cared. The group was presented by CKLN (Ryerson's other radio station) and the show was expected to start at 7:00 p.m. Oh well, 8:30 was close enough.

Sherbet's performance was professional but so what? So are the performances of countless other bands playing today or ten years ago. This is what's wrong with their music, they're doing nothing more than what was done ten years ago.

I went in there with an open mind. They have written almost all their songs and most of them had fairly interesting beginnings and endings, it's what the lead guitarist put in the middle that bothered me. By about the third song (I said I went in there with an open mind) I started to notice that I knew each of the riffs the guitarist was going to play. Now I'm not saying that I know that many riffs, but when you've heard the same ones since you were fourteen you start to know them.

The keyboard player acted a little too much like Rick Wakeman for my liking and the lead singer's voice was almost identical to the lead singer in Savoy Brown (just what we need). But I have no quarrels with the bassist or drummer. In fact, I think they should start a group on their own. They not only kept a good steady beat but they also put out a little energy, the only energy the group seemed to have.

Well, enough on Sherbet. That's not who the audience came to see anyway. They really came to see the opening act (who, by the way, came on after Sherbet at 9:30), Maclean and Maclean. Now I like a joke just as much as the next guy, in fact I did laugh at a lot of their little inspirations, but after they'd discussed Chinese, piss, shit, jerking-off, dope, Christmas, politics and Star Wars, I figured gee, what's left. I think I left during the part when Mr. Spock was inspecting the make-up of a planet called Jism.

The highlight of the evening was the draw for the six hundred dollar stereo. With a bargain like this I wondered why more people hadn't shown up. Then one of the students at Ry High told me that it's the third stereo they've given away this year. Too bad kids, better luck next time.

Liona trades hot licks

As a person whose taste in music and performance runs more towards power chord crunch and flame-throwing laser smokebombs than to nimble arpeggios and black bow ties, it was with a mixture of trepidation and curiosity that I attended the CRT-FM Festival Series in the Ryerson Theater on Sunday night.

The big promo scam surrounding the evening concerned the showcasing of the frenetic-fingered talent of classical guitarist Liona Boyd. Depending on which know-it-all music-snob deigns to speak to you, she is either the living embodiment of dedicated artistry or the Dolly Parton of stuffed shirt music.

And it is precisely here that we find the basis for some uneasy feelings towards this performer. While it is true that Boyd has introduced many people to classical music, it must be acknowledged that this group of people is her audience and her's alone. The Sunday concert provided ample evidence of this disheartening fact.

The evening ended with the superlative CRT orchestra performing Meddlesome's Scotch Symphony, which, I am told, is a moving and beautiful piece of music. Moving it was, as the audience (several had left after Boyd was finished for the evening) squirmed and oozed in their seats as if the forces of lethargy incarnate were chortling them under their testicles. The 1812 Overture, "2001", or even the "Lone Ranger Symphony" would have been more appropriate for this crowd.

Perhaps the most striking example of the audience's exclusive attachment to Boyd was evidenced in her duet with violinist Fujiko Imajishi. Granted, the two pieces they did, Centone di Sonate No. 1 in A Major and Sonata for Violin and Guitar in D major Op. 3 and No. 3 were written by a violinist, Paganini. But it was the zest and brilliance with which her parts were played that allowed Imajishi to steal this portion of the show. Disappointingly though, it seemed that only those not blinded by "LIONA BOYD's" appearance on the same stage appreciated the effort.

In no way should this be construed as a criticism of Boyd's performance. She shone during Rodrigo's Fantasia para un Gentilhombre for Guitar and Orchestra. It was her best moment of the night as she took command, leading the orchestra, trading licks with it, then moving onward.

Overall, I was less than impressed with what I saw, and heard, largely because my expectations were left unfulfilled. Seen in this light, it might not be harsh to suggest that Boyd keep tabs on the kinds of hype being generated on her behalf as well as the kind of audience she's attracting. Otherwise, similarly disappointed though less forgiving first-timers will be lost not only to her but to classical music as a whole.

Schlock!

Different people had different ways of approaching Erich Segal's Love Story when both the movie and book came out. Some bought three boxes of tissue and cried for a week. Others sneered and chuckled a lot. Personally I sneered, chuckled, and then cried (the latter, of course, in private).

Erich Segal admitted that he was only in it for the money, but then again who isn't these days? Love Story was the classic tear-jerker. Many of us hoped that Segal would retire on his earnings and build a tear-shaped swimming pool in memoriam on his country estate. No such luck though, because he's written another one.

Oliver's Story, surprisingly enough, is the story of Oliver, two years after Jennie's death. He remains a successful young lawyer, but on the social level he's a dead loss. Suddenly he meets a mystery woman, who's just as much a snotty bitch as his ex. The relationship that ensues is a virtual re-write of the earlier Oliver-Jennie affair.

Segal does nothing new in this sequel. No one dies, but the ending is, at first reading and you know that you're going to read it more than once, horribly unsatisfying.

It's easy reading and it's lousy literature. The plot is basically the same as his first work. The writing is choppy, vulgar, and loose. The ending is very annoying. But damn it, it made me sad. And that's what it's all about.

Kudos For Colored Girls

For theatre-goers who have considered suicide, faced with the extravagances of the Royal Alexandra and the O'Keefe Centre and the frequently dismal ration of talent to ticket price, the current performance at the Royal Alexandra is a ray of hope. In fact, it is the winter of discontent made glorious . . .

For Colored Girls Who Have Considered Suicide When The Rainbow Is Enuf is a gem, a delight, and a wonderfully successful staging of poetry bolstered with exotic and unfamiliar choreography. It avoids excess and yet in a spirit of sheer exuberance approaches the problems of colour, and more importantly, feminine femaleness in the USA.

The concept is daring; seven women, each sheathed in a vibrant colour, dance onto a bare hexagonal stage and compare their views of growing up, being exposed to the realities of street and city love, and having to cope with the compounded problems of being deprived, coloured, and women. The poetry is good — damned good. The dancing is ecstatic, very uninhibited, a little hard to adjust to. The voices are more flexible than the bodies themselves, instruments of infinite variety. In a variety of coloured voices, more expressive by far than our flat northern accents, in voices which soared into the heights of the theatre, they described their passions and the reprehensible patterns of menfolk.

Two observations need to be made. This is a highly visible, feminist point of view. But it is not an obnoxious one, one which reverses the inequities of history by substituting more injustice between the sexes. It does make abundantly clear the understanding and love women feel for men who think they are preserving their privacy and scheming in secret. Our foibles, as well as our plots, are easily spotted. And women who can express the situation can be freed to adapt to it and even to alter it.

Second: the play deals with being coloured in a white world. Perhaps it is easier for all concerned in Canada, where discrimination is more likely to be directed at Eastern Europeans or East Asians than at 'blacks', since we are inclined to deplore the U.S. race problem. Perhaps, more likely, it is the positive approach taken by the poetry and developed by the performers. Coloured is not white, it is a natural strength and way of life. But the economics of a white-dominated society have perverted that coloured life of the soul.

These two points emerged, with striking force, as the audience in the theatre was, within minutes of the play's commencements, alternately forced into a consciousness of strangeness and of familiarity. Cultural and racial barriers were easily hurdled. Men were being nudged in the ribs by the women who were with them. And blacks and white found equal humour, and not malice, in jokes concerning colour and its cultural values. There was, indeed a highly celebratory atmosphere to this production.

For Colored Girls is an excellent production: for once, one needn't squawk about the exorbitant price of tickets. It is highly emotional, there is no withholding of energies by the cast — after one exceedingly intense reading, a night with Beau Willie Brown, the actress visibly collected herself on stage, through a pause longer than any other I've seen succeed.

Achieving success with apparently formless theatre, linked only by words and thoughts, requires talent and vision. Perhaps most credit should be given to the expressive writing of Ntozake Shange, perhaps to director Oz Scott. Perhaps the quality of the achievement is due to the individual grace of the seven ladies welded into one dance. I don't know whom to praise. It is unnecessary. I can no longer give meaning to suicide.

John Wilson

Dames du Quebec

Michel Gagneau's starkly staged Quatre a Quatre, now receiving a strong production at St. Paul's Centre by Le Theatre de P'tit Bonheur, is almost inaccessible to anyone who is not further advanced than cereal-box bilingualism, with a supplement of reading awareness, for the play lives in the true voice of rural Quebec, the joul.

My own problems with language invalidate any credentials I might have as a reviewer. In essence, then, the play deals with four generations of Quebecois women and their interrelationships, centered on their unsatisfactory relationships with the opposite sex, deals with their need for an understanding and a mutual support for each other. It seems to have been handled with a lack of triteness, though remember that both writer and viewer were male and probably share similar assumptions about women.

For an English-speaking viewer, the problems of the joul are complicated by the play's structure (each character is given a long monologue to commence) and the leftover set from Joaquin Murietta, which is massive, multi-levelled, so that each generation is represented surrounded by typical furnishings of her period.

The acting abilities of the cast soon transcended, as they ought, purely linguistic barriers. Particularly effective was Viola Leger, as Pauline, the grandmother and a lush.

It is difficult to provide anything like a worthwhile review of a play which one cannot claim to have fully understood. Nevertheless, director Eugene Gallant, working once again with Viola Leger and a cast of well-disciplined actors, even on a stage which over-isolated the representatives of each generation, has achieved a mastery of tone and conveyed, even to an English-Canadian, a solid sense of human experience. For an anglophone, a difficult but rewarding experience, an opportunity to see work by one of Quebec's important voices; for francophones, a chance likewise to see good theatre where French is in danger of extinction.

art

Here to tickle you to the top of your Padian pilasters is Melvin Charney with his recent architectural projects at the AGO. His comeback from the Corridor fiasco at the Olympics in Montreal can be seen till April 30. Also at the AGO is Belgian artist Pierre Alechinsky, a co-founder of the COBRA group in post-war Europe, and Karel Appel's colleague on canvas, till April 30.

Continuing shows include the Art Rental Painting Exhibition in which the AGO shows how it can move into the living rooms and bedrooms of the nation, and the Recent Acquisitions show, both till April 3. Bo'you Neeloe: Profiles of Canadian Indian Art, The Inuit Print, and Eadward Maybridge photography all continue till April 2.

Anna Myers and Lena Endicott are featured at the Hart House Gallery — the last of the March campus shows as the essay factories churn. Till March 31.

John Ridgewell is one of the few artists who has managed to clone a pastoral marsh landscape onto a pine writing desk. For this and more surrealism, visit the Albert White Gallery till March 29. Gershon Iskowitz at the Gallery Moos is dialectically opposed, with his spotted canvases, to the Ridgewell technique, and should have been used in one of the Spadina subway line art works. Till April 6.

It has been proven that students can run art galleries... and even set them up. Philip Pless has opened a gallery on Avenue Road with an opening show by the Asian artist Ang Klukok who borrows heavily from Picasso's Guernica but makes the grade. At the Pless Gallery (what else?) till May 1.

For those of you who have had a close encounter, the posthumous Kurelek show at the Isaac's has a painting that "means something... it's important". If you've seen the movie, see Kurelek's "The Rock" (1962). It's eerie. Till April 1.

York University's Samuel J. Zacks Gallery has an exhibition of works by students affiliated with Stong College, till March 23. Another example of art for the smart.

Mendelson Joe and company has ventured into artistry, and he's exhibiting works in a group show at the Merton Gallery till April 1. Apparently he makes a dynamite salad — perhaps his greatest achievement.

Sculpture-haters meet your nemesis with the Michael Steiner show at the David Mirvish Gallery till April 5. It's chunky, not spindly and rates high for tactability.

With William Tucker at the Sable-Castelli Gallery and Arnold H. Crane's Portraits of the Photographers at the David Mirvish Gallery, you have a palatable Toronto art scene.

jazz

Hello Jazz Fans! Rising from moribundity like a phoenix, Yellowfingers of Yorkville will open its doors on Monday with the Eugene Amaro Quintet. The club closed down in November because outside construction work had reduced its clientele. In the fall, after-hours shows and a Sunday dinner concert supplemented the regular nightly feature, but these proved financially unsuccessful. Now music will be offered Monday to Friday from 8:30 to 1:00 a.m. Other changes in the format: no cover charge at the door (except for imported talent), and a new menu specializing in Chinese food. The minimum table charge remains, although the exact amount has not yet been set. 1280 Bay at Yorkville, 967-9337.

Guitarist Barney Kessel plays at Bourbon St. until Saturday. Next week will present alto saxophonist Lee Konitz, who pioneered his own variety of cool jazz in the fifties. His improvisations are too intellectual and unfeeling for this listener.

At George's, the Joe Sealy Quartet finishes off the week, followed on Monday by the regular monthly Moe Koffman Quintet.

The Tim Cummins Band entertains at Cafe Soho after hours this weekend. On Sunday at 2:30, pianist Ira Cohen will perform two concerts at 2:00 and 5:30 p.m. $2 cover.

Today at Hart House, Bruce Styles will tinkle away at the keys while his bassist and drummer accompany him. Next Wednesday will heat up as Ginny Grant drops in with the quintet.

At the Copper Lounge, the Norm Amadio Trio plays Saturday with Don Thompson.

Tonight through Friday, the Horseshoe Tavern presents the amazing bigband free jazz of Sun Ra and his Sound Sculpture. Next week brings in Carla Bley.

Another very slow week. Tomorrow at 2:10 you can hear a free concert of student compositions in Walter Hall. That evening, Michael Jaffee's Waverly Consort offers a program of Spanish Renaissance music at the St. Lawrence Centre.

Sunday at eight, pianist Marek Joblonski plays at the Leah Posluns Theatre at 4588 Bathurst. I haven't heard anything about him in years, but I'll never forget his CBC special. Highlights were a jeremiad on "girls who think they're good because they can play an early Beethoven sonata," and a great shot of Marek patting himself on the back because some joker told him, "For the F minor Fantasy, there is only Rubenstein, Malczewski, and you!"

The TSO reappears Tuesday with Vladimir Orloff in the Khachaturian Cello Concerto, and what should be a fine Dvorak Sixth from the reliable Vaclav Neumann.

varg radio

Welcome to yet another thrilling instalment of Life With Campus Radio. Radio Varsity, or University of Toronto Radio as we prefer it to be known, has big news and it involves you. Set aside Friday March 31st at 7:30 in the evening. Live from the Innis Town Hall at Innis College (St. George & Sussex) University of Toronto Radio will present The Gene Taylor show on CBC television. There's room for a studio audience of about 150 but plan to arrive just after 7 to get a good seat. In addition to Gene, there will be talk about the concept of campus radio, campus performers, music, comedy and a special guest star from L. A. More details to come.

Radio Varsity set a precedent with the anti-cutbacks rally at Con Hall, when we provided live coverage of this significant event for students around campus. Along with the live speakers we presented background commentary and provided material for local stations CKO and CJRT on the event. We feel that this demonstrates the need of campus radio to cover events other media can or will not, and it also shows that we are capable of fulfilling this mandate.

Of course Radio Varsity also provided impartial coverage of the SAC presidential elections with interviews of both the candidates and their platforms.

Yes, campus radio is alive. With your support we can grow and develop even more into the service we think you're worth. Drop by the studios anytime with your ideas, or if you want to hear some of ours. In the meantime, keep listening! (We're on the third floor, 91 St. George. Give us a call for news, requests or information, at 978-4324.)

rock

Mary O'Hara minces into Massey Hall on the 17th of next month. More fun than eating spaghetti on a roller coaster. And, of course, Gorpo Lightfoot is at the Hall in the meantime. Rumour has it that the place has installed a sauna. Maria Muldaur flies into Con Hall on the 2nd. Great stuff if you like camels. And Eric Clapton has threatened to actually perform his show at the Gardens on the 9th will wide awake, a marked departure from his recent style. Also on the 9th, the Chilean group, Inti Ilumani, will be at Con Hall.

And on the club circuit, the ol' chimney has Saga, the Gasworks has Ian Thomas, the El Mo has Taj Mahal in tonight. In the near future the El Mo is having the Runaways and the Ramones. About time. The Horseshoe has the esoteric Sun Ra and the Colonial is featuring The Jam.

But enough of the small fry. The big event of the week is that tomorrow, if you clear down to the Coliseum at the Exhibition, you can actually meet, face to face, Grizzly

Adams. I kid you not.

movies

Wednesday: OISE begins the week in a style to which we are not accustomed. They have a pairing which a) makes sense together, b) is thematically tied and c) consists of excellent films in their own rights — Nicolas Ray's Johnny Guitar and Godard's Wind From The East. Meanwhile the New Yorker is still showing Grateful Dead fans detailed and glossy prints of their favourite corpses and the Revue is finishing off its week of 1900. Cinema Lumiere continues to play catch-me-if-you-can with this department. To find out what's showing you'll have to phone 925-9938. And out in the hinterlands the Science Centre has a collection of less-than-long movies by Ernst Lubisch including The Doll and Sumerla.

Thursday: The Revue offers a spot of paradise for the English major short on time with Felding via Tony Richardson's Joseph Andrews and Conrad via Gerard Vaughn-Hughes The Duellists. Together they amount to a significant argument for the congenial inferiority of film. For Slavic studies types interested in the same exercise the Science Centre has Gerheite (?) from the Bulgarian novel of the same name. OISE follows up last Thursday's program with instalment two of Battle of Chile: Coup D'Etat which leads up to and includes footage of the Sept. 11 coup shot by a cameraman right up to the moment of his death at the guns of the Chilean military. Also on the program is Blood of the Condor which concerns the plight of the Indian population of Bolivia.

Friday: The Science Centre has a pair of geo-physical investigations of Eden, Green Hill and Sinners In Paradise. Meanwhile the fine foax at the U of T Film Society (in what just might be their last showing of the year) have The Spy Who Loved Me and, for a change (enter drumroll in motley) an honest to God good film, Enter the Dragon.

Saturday: I'm going drinking and you should too.

Sunday: Innis has shut down for Easter, or so it would seem, perhaps they're having an egg roll on the lawn.

Monday: The best news in town is that the Revue is starting a Ginger Rogers-Fred Astaire festival. Monday and Tuesday it's Follow The Fleet and The Gay Divorcee.

Tuesday: The week closes quietly with no changes except at the Science Centre where the immortal (no kidding) Pola Negri stars in Lubisch's Madame du Barry.

And as usual the little voice in the wilderness is wailing like the children of the ostrich — Any and all movie reviewers who will be returning to the department next year should get in touch sometime. Please? Squeak, squeak?

theatre

Direct from Barrie, the theatre watsup. This Saturday Toronto Workshop Prod. previews the Lindsay Kemp Company's "Flowers", a pantomime for Jean Genet. Kemp has done everything from advising David Bowie to directing opera. Phone 925-8640 for prices and details.

Good news coming soon at the O'Keefe, the fabulous singling Bachelors, Billy Dainty, Pope and his puppet friends, Tony Venner, and the famous foot juggler Judy Moxon. If you want more info., inquire at 999 Queen St.

Continuing shows: Babar, The Little Elephant at St. Lawrence Centre. Town Hall. Call 366-7723 until the 28th. Sexual Perversity In Chicago boogies on at the New Theatre. Call 534-1101 for details. At the Royal Alex. For Colored Girls closes Saturday.

This week Annie opens at the O'Keefe, that's right the Bachelors are not due for a while. It's the story of a stumpy little girl and her dog, but it's doing great business on Broadway. Brides Of Dracula continues at Toronto Free Theatre. It's received mixed reviews but sounds like an evening of campy fun.

For the family: Arsenic And Old Lace at the Bayview Playhouse. Great film but I'm not too sure about this version.

John

I was sitting there, see, and this guy walks in..

So there I was, sorta, bone-weary and brain-drained in the controlled clutter of the Varsity office, when this guy, wearing your standard army jacket and jeans, stumbles in out of the dark and shoves an album in my hand. "Fine," I mumble as I looked down at the dramatic cover which read "Michal Hasek with Sundog. The Radio Play." "And who are you?" "Michal Hasek", he whispered and, with a sly wink, he stepped out of the office into that realm of the unknown beyond the perception of our senses.

Now, there's something disarming about receiving an album, out of the blue, from the fella who made it. I mean, if you pan it, he knows what you look like. You could wake up the next morning with a chicken nailed to your forehead. On the other hand, there's something refreshingly sincere about the personal touch. And, though this may just be a coincidence, the same can be said about this album.

That's not to say that it's a spectacular disc. Hasek and Co. tend to spread themselves a little thin in an attempt to cover all the bases. But the album as a whole, which is a collection of gentle rockers, blues tunes and Paul Simonish things, is great example of just what can be done on a small budget with some reasonably talented friends. The best songs are the ones that move along, such as "Little Man" and the old Taj Mahal tune, "She Caught the K.T." It's only on the slow ones, such as "Starling" that one begins to squirm a little at the sentimentalities being expressed.

So that leaves you with a friendly collection of tunes that couldn't offend a soul. Hasek has a good voice, with a great bass range, and has promise of becoming a decent songwriter if he can regulate his saccharine intake. Sundog are all fine musicians, with special kudos to the drummer and saxophonists. It's an album for calm people who are sick of hype or having chickens nailed to their foreheads.

What do you want from live? The music is as good as the titles

Latest to come our way in the numbing deluge of double-live albums are the Tubes, everyone's favourite paragons of perversity. The album title challenges us with the musical question What Do You Want From Live? Perhaps the answer is to be found in the montage of lurid in-concert photos spread across the open record jacket. Bondage suits. Pasties. Turgid flesh. Pictures you have to view from several angles before they begin to make sense. Just slightly off the beaten track, n'est-ce pas?

Sure 'nuff, all the catchy tunes that gained the Tubes fame and notoriety are here: "White Punks On Dope", "Mondo Bondage", "Don't Touch Me There", "I Was A Punk Before You Were A Punk". In addition there's a trendy new-wave version of the Beatles' classic "I Saw Her Standing There", plus the "Crime Medley", featuring the "Perry Mason Theme Song". Lead singer Fee Waybill qua Monty Hall sang "Whaddya Want From Life Contest." Something for everyone.

The Tubes do not rely solely on novel song titles for their appeal. Their multiple guitars, percussion, and vocals provide for a powerful, thrusting sound. For the most part they play hard, fast rock, but the grating edge is tempered by Michael Cotton's creative and talented synthesizer work. Cotton's synthesizer is integrated into the total sound, never reducing itself to an extraneous whine.

But the sound never remains the same. A gutsy rock'n'roll roller will be followed by Bill Spooner's raspy, seductive vocals against a sparse bass-woodblock-keyboard background. Which in turn will be followed by the punk-staccato of "I Saw Her Standing There". Then to the torrid vocal harmonies of "Don't Touch Me There." And "Show Me A Reason" is unadulterated poprock.

All in all, not a bad album. (There's an overly extended drum solo, strategically placed last cut, third side, enabling its avoidance with a minimum of trouble.) It has humour, it has character, and the music excels. What Do You Want From Live? is a tight little package with something guaranteed to amuse and offend everyone. Lightfoot fans beware!

Three Man Team Takes Fourth In U.S. Boxing Championship

By AL LEE

Led by Dick Wright, a three-man boxing contingent from the U of T, took fourth place in the Eastern Collegiate Boxing Association (E.C.B.A.) championships held at West Chester Pennsylvania last weekend. U of T was the only Canadian club present in the 14 team tournament.

You're never too young to put on the gloves.

Fighting in his last bout for the U of T, Wright defeated a heavily favoured competitor to take first place in the light welterweight division. Wright had to defeat West Chester favourite Bart Tuttle who earlier this season had knocked out the defending U.S. champ.

The title match started slowly as Wright and Tuttle circled warily, fencing with exploratory jabs and light combinations. The fight was even as the bell sounded to end the first round.

Between rounds, coach Tony Canzano instructed Wright to take the offensive; which he did with surprising effectiveness. Faking to the body with a left, Wright dropped a short over-hand right past Tuttle's left glove which staggered the West Chester boxer and caused him to drop to his knees.

Tuttle got back to his feet before he could be counted out, but Wright again took the offensive as he stormed out of the neutral corner. Wright once again sized up his opponent and repeated the successful combination. Tuttle collapsed to the ropes and the referee stopped the contest.

Wright's victory in the ECBA has earned him a shot at the U.S. national title this weekend.

Unfortunately however, he will not be making the trip because of a severe strain on the budget caused by cutbacks.

Rangy U of T veteran, Rolf Jansen, was runner-up in the 172 pound class. Jansen posted convincing decisions over opponents from Ohio and Penn State on the way to his Saturday night final against defending National Champion, Gary Woodring of West Chester.

Jansen's snapping jab and fancy footwork served him well in the first two bouts, and kept Woodring at bay in the early going of the final night's action. But the champion scored with strong right leads and right crosses in the late moments of the fight to take the decision.

Novice boxer Elie Kivity, was defeated by a seasoned veteran from Villanova. Bob Spagnola, fighting in his third collegiate championship, controlled the first round with a devastating left hook and seemed to have Kivity in trouble at the close of the second round.

In the third, Spagnola wilted visibly and Kivity came on strong with straight lefts and rights. Although the judgement went to the Villanova fighter, Kivity was warmly applauded for his plucky come-back.

Blues' Balloon Burst By Bears

By JIM O'LEARY

For only the fourth time since Tom Watt became coach 13 years ago, the hockey Blues are not the national champions. For 1978, this distinction falls on the University of Alberta Golden Bears who beat the Blues 6-5 in the nationally televised Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union final Sunday afternoon.

For the Bears it was their fourth national title and sweet revenge for the 4-1 drubbing handed them by the Blues in last year's final in Edmonton.

"It was our turn to win," said Alberta captain and the tournament's most valuable player Kevin Primeau. "Toronto has a hell of a team but when we want to beat down we have the best checkers in the country which was the difference out there today."

The Bears forechecking was indeed the difference in the game, as time and again they forced the Blues into costly errors in their own end. It took Alberta less than nine minutes to jump into what proved to be an insurmountable 3-0 lead.

"Alberta is just too good a team to come back when you fall that far behind," said U of T coach Tom Watt. "Actually we were fortunate to be within one goal."

"Forechecking is the key to their win. They didn't let us free wheel like we were able to in the other games."

Alberta Coach Clare Drake agreed that the difference in the game was his team's checking which protected their lead.

"Forechecking is the key to our game. We've always been able to do pretty well with it," said Drake.

"The difference between this game and our loss last year though, was that last year we didn't score until the third period. It loosened us up to score first today. Toronto usually likes to play pretty conservatively but they were forced to change their style a bit when they fell behind. This made it easier for us to check."

Alberta built their 3-0 lead in a span of less than four minutes in the first period. Kevin Primeau got the ball rolling with his first of two goals at 4:40. Dave Breakwell scored the first of his two goals on a power play at 6:14 before Stan Swales scored at 8:28.

The usually potent Blues' offence had been dormant up to this point but a pair of power play goals by Dan D'Alvise and Larry Hopkins allowed the Blues to go to the dressing room behind 4-2.

The second period was a reverse of the first with only one goal scored.

Toronto's Doug Herridge banked a shot off an Alberta defender to bring the Blues to within one.

Hopes for a comeback were shattered after only 1:50 of the third period when Alberta's John Devaney slapped the puck past Dave Jenner.

The Blues again managed to move to within one when Cary Farelli lifted the puck over the Alberta netminder but the two goal cushion was restored two minutes later by Primeau's second goal.

Rocci Pagnello scored the Blues fifth goal, but in the last minute with the goalie on the bench in favor of an extra attacker, the Blues could not muster any pressure.

Alberta outshot Toronto 47-23.

The Blues made it to the final by way of a 7-3 win over the host Moncton Blue Eagles and an impressive 9-3 win over the Quebec conference champions, the Concordia Stingers.

Against Concordia, the Blues showed a balanced attack with all three lines scoring. Graduating veteran Herridge led the scorers with two goals and an assist. Other scorers were Farelli with two, Frank Davis, Dan Tsubouchi, Alex Jeans, D'Alvise and Doug Caines.

Against Moncton, the line of D'Alvise, Hopkins and Farelli put on a real show as they collected 12 points. Farelli led the scorers with three goals and two assists, Hopkins had a goal and three assists and D'Alvise had one goal and an assist. Other scorers were Ron Harris and Herridge.

BLUE LINES: Cary Farelli capped a record-breaking season with a record-breaking performance in the finals. In the four-day tourney he scored six goals and four assists — a new record. Farelli also became the Blues' highest single season scorer with 47 goals, 43 assists and 90 points. That shattered the old mark of 82 points on 37 goals and 45 assists set by Don Pagnutti in the 73-74 season. Kent Runke has the most goals in a season — 51 in the 75-76 season.

Dan D'Alvise tied Pagnutti's mark of 45 assists in a season.

The Blues also scored 316 goals this past season to shatter the mark of 272 set in 1972-73. And yet another record set this year is 34 wins in a season. The previous high was the mark of 33 set last year.

The Blues will only lose four graduating players from this year's team. They are all, however, very valuable players and will be next to impossible to replace. Graduating are captain Larry Hopkins, last year's captain Ron Harris, assistant captain Doug Herridge and first year Blue (but four year U.S. veteran) Dan Tsubouchi.

While most players will be packing away their equipment for next year, Hopkins will be moving his gear over to Maple Leaf Gardens. The reason? Hopkins begins a tryout this week with the Leafs.

"He's a big, strong guy who goes up and down his wing," said Leafs general manager Jim Gregory. If he impresses the Leafs brass he may get into a game or two this year and will be invited to camp next September.

The fact that the Blues always do so well is in part a credit to the people behind the scenes. The unglamorous task of looking after arrangements, packing and caring for the equipment and getting up early to make sure practices go as planned was ably handled by manager Nick Pantaleo and trainers Mike Gisborne and Rick (Chico) Benson.

Right winger Farelli and defenceman Joe Grant were named to the tournament all-star team.

Caines Named M.V.P.

By JIM O'LEARY

Although they didn't win the national championship, a couple of Blues did not come home from Moncton empty handed.

Doug Caines was selected as the outstanding player in Canadian Intercollegiate hockey and was named first team all-Canadian, while defenceman Rocci Pagnello was picked as a second team all-Canadian.

Caines just completed his first full season with the Blues. Last year, knee surgery sidelined him for most of the season. He played in only 22 games but compiled an impressive 18 goals, 23 assists, 41 point season.

This year he led the Ontario Universities Athletic Association (OUAA) in scoring with 30 goals and 27 assists in 20 games. Over the whole season he racked up 43 goals and 33 assists.

Caines came to the U of T after an outstanding career with St. Catharines in the OHA Major Junior

A. He was a fourth round draft pick of the New York Rangers.

For many, Caines' acceptance speech at the awards luncheon was the highlight of the weekend.

Jokingly, he said: "I'd like to thank my line-mates Levy (Alex Jeans) and Tsubouchi (Dan) because if I didn't they'd goon me when I got back to the table."

For the veteran Pagnello, the award was another in a long list of achievements since he joined the Blues four years ago. In this span he has been named an OUAA all-star, most valuable player in the national championships in 1977, and a member of the Student National team that competed in Europe over the Christmas holidays.

Pagnello has always been known as a smooth stickhandler and playmaker and this year combined with Rob Gemmell to give the Blues a potent defensive duo. He scored 11 goals and 31 assists in 41 games.

Cary Farelli (6) can score from almost any position. Here he uses the bump and run to the amazement of Larry Hopkins.

St. Mike's Downs Victoria To Hold On To Jennings Cup

By HUGH STUART

"No heroes now. No heroes. Let's play smart," instructed SMC coach Zen Janusaitis. His players followed those instructions to the letter in completing a surprising two-game playoff sweep over league leading Victoria College last Monday. The 4-2 victory gave SMC their second Jennings' Cup title in the last two years.

SMC had a 1-0 lead at the half-way point of the game on the strength of Dan Feraday's tally from a goal mouth scramble. Then, midway through the period, forward Guido Mazza went to work. Playing on a line with Mike Flintoff and Bill Leclair, Mazza found Leclair in the slot for SMC's second marker and assisted on Chris Gartley's sharp angled power play goal that gave St. Mike's a commanding 3-0 lead.

It was expected that Vic would come out flying in the third, but they ran into two problems. The first was ferocious forechecking by all three SMC lines that effectively bottled up the Vic attack. The second obstacle was a poor call early in the period by referee Doug Sly. Victoria's John Field put teammate Glen Foden in the clear with a perfect pass, but it was ruled offside. After the game Sly admitted that he made a mistake on the call. Said Sly, "Yeah I blew the call, but it's difficult to make calls like that with a two-referee system. With play of this quality, we need three."

As a result of the call, Vic suffered a momentary letdown. St. Mike's responded with heavy pressure. The Victoria goalie absolutely robbed Flintoff from in close but failed to stop Paul Bonazza's end to end effort. Bonazza's goal seemed to wake Vic from their slumber and they started raining shots on SMC goalie Jim Ranieri. However, Ranieri and shot blocking defencemen Gartley, Bonazza, Feraday, and Steve Platt kept Vic off of the scoreboard.

With 6:47 left in the game, defenceman Steve Porter spoiled Ranieri's shutout bid with a low screen shot from the point. With time running out, Victoria was forced to open up which left them vulnerable to SMC counterattacks. One St. Mike's goal was called back because it was directed in by a skate, and the SMC forwards just failed to click on numerous occasions.

Vic was able to apply sustained pressure for the only time in the game during the final three minutes. After Rick Seblon missed a wide open net, peskey forward Vic Langley cut in on Feraday and slipped the puck past Ranieri to narrow the score to 4-2. Despite pulling their goalie for a sixth attacker, Vic couldn't add to their total and the score remained 4-2.

How was SMC able to win with such relative ease? There are many reasons. The first is the coaching of Janusaitis who taught his players disciplined play. The second is the balance of the St. Mike's attack. The third and most important reason was the SMC spirit. St. Mike's appeared to simply want the win more than Victoria.

Irregularities at Erindale

By HEATHER HILL

Some faux pas taken in the Erindale College Student Union (ECSU) electoral procedures have led to candidates' complaints about the validity of the elections.

Greg Tyndall, manager for CFRE Radio Erindale and a candidate for ECSU president, said that under the election rules candidates were permitted to campaign on slates (consisting of people running for positions other than the president and two vice-presidents) but the actual ballots would list only the tickets of three, not the other affiliations.

However, when the ballots arrived from the printer yesterday morning, the party of presidential candidate Ray Easterbrook contained the names of two other candidates for sub-positions.

Gordon Shantz, current ECSU vice-president and chief returning officer for the elections, held yesterday and today, admitted yesterday that "very many people (have been) filing complaints" about the ballots.

Shantz, who wrote the election rules two weeks ago, refused to comment further because "if I say anything, I'm either acknowledging or denying there's a mistake in them."

Tyndall said yesterday he had sent a letter of complaint to Shantz and that "dependent upon the outcome I will ask for the elections to be declared void." Rick Harrison, campaign manager for Wellington Womble, another presidential candidate, said he too had filed a complaint.

"The handling of the election has been somewhat of a joke here," said Harrison. He said he didn't think the majority of the students were aware the election rules had been contravened.

ECSU president Rob Mowat described the ballots as a "case of omission." He attributed the printing of the affiliations with Easterbrook to a "confusion on the part of the printer."

Mowat said that Shantz had taken an ad from the college newspaper Medium II containing the names of the candidates to the printer and that in the course of the conversation between the two the printer "developed an understanding that the affiliations were to go in."

Both Mowat and Shantz declined to give the name of the printer.

Shantz said that when he had written the rules he discussed them with ECSU president Mowat. He said the problem lay in the "interpretation" of the rules and that the ECSU Board of Directors was ultimately responsible for them. When asked if he had consulted the board before making the rules public to the candidates, Shantz declined to comment.

Mowat said he saw "no problems (with the rules) at that time." He felt that the other candidates weren't "grossly mistreated."

Tyndall said that the ballots indicated a broad base of support for the Easterbrook party. He said that if he thought the affiliations would be printed on the ballot he too would have had candidates for other positions on his ticket. "I'm losing votes as far as I'm concerned," said Tyndall.

Tyndall also charged that the all-candidates forum held Monday at the college contravened the election regulations.

Tyndall said that the candidates were told that only presidential hopefuls would be allowed to speak. Mowat ruled that Bill Train, a vice-presidential candidate for Ray Easterbrook who had come with a prepared speech, couldn't speak. According to Harrison, Shantz overturned Mowat's decision and allowed Train to speak. Jules Bloch, the vice-presidential candidate for Tyndall, was consequently allowed to speak although he had no speech prepared.

Train was unavailable for comment.

Canadian research is threatened

By JOHN CAMERON

"The Canadian capacity to do competitive research, in what is essentially an international competition, is being seriously undermined," according to Tom Clark, U of T Director of Research Administration.

In a recently released report, Clark charged that "the wilful neglect of university research in the non-medical science area defies rational explanation."

Through the use of many graphs and statistics, the report clearly demonstrates that relative to other industrial nations, Canada spends a smaller proportion of its gross domestic product, on scientific research. The report says that this proportion is diminishing every year, while the proportion of funds in the United States is increasing.

Research in the university and industrial sectors is suffering greatly relative to the federal Government's in-house research programs, according to the report.

Clark said in a telephone interview yesterday that the "subtle reason behind this is that salaries paid to employees in the federal Government's in-house research programs are indexed to inflation." On the other hand, "until 1975, university grants were not indexed to inflation and indeed, now are being indexed at a rate below inflation."

Clark said that "university research grants have been allowed a 7 per cent increase for this year," while the rate of inflation is much higher than that.

The greatest problem is that "the gap is growing and (the universities) accumulate one heck of a lot of lost capacity over the years," he said.

Clark said he wrote the report for "in-house

By ANDREW MAHON

Maria Horvath was fired by the Graduate Students' Union (GSU) executive last Wednesday, but the executive decision was almost overturned when a motion to reinstate the Grad Post editor was raised at a GSU general council meeting last Thursday.

The motion to reinstate Horvath was narrowly defeated by an 11-10 margin during a 10-hour session of the general council which ended at 5 a.m. Friday.

Six of the 11 votes cast against came from GSU executive members.

The motion itself was raised after 9 continuous hours of discussion over procedure, the GSU constitution and the Horvath case itself, which had come to a climax with the dismissal of the Grad Post editor.

With this action, the Grad Post has been severed from Canadian University Press (CUP), since the prime recommendation of the CUP investigation commission report stated that dismissal action was not warranted at this point.

The marathon meeting began with the familiar procedural wrangling associated with the Horvath affair when the chair's impartiality was questioned by some members and the order of the agenda was discussed. The topic of Horvath's firing was classified as a "personnel matter" in the agenda and was originally slated for closed discussion.

There was strong opposition to this proposal, especially from Horvath.

"I want it open," insisted the former editor of the now defunct graduate paper. "By issuing the January 27 warning letter to CUP, you (GSU executive) have already made it open. I have a right to a public hearing."

The motion to open the matter was passed 18 to 11.

CUPE local 1281 president Rick Gregory was on hand to make some comments about the executive's power in hiring and firing employees. (Horvath is a unionized employee.)

"We recognize, with the advantage of hindsight, that we should have not entered into the debate to the extent that we did," said Gregory. "Clearly in the past we (union employees) have been hired, laid off and dismissed by the executive."

When the personnel matter came up on the agenda, Leo Casey presented a 25-page brief outlining the charges against Horvath. Included in the comprehensive brief were several charts comparing last year's Grad Post to this year's paper in terms of "filler" stories, photographs and authorship of stories.

Casey prefaced his remarks by saying that "this has probably been the most ugly incident in our lives—it may be a joke, particularly to those who edit the Varsity, but it happens to be a reality."

After Casey's brief, Horvath responded to the charges and summarized what she saw as the major reason for her dismissal.

"The problem is that the GSU executive has got into a rut—they're used to getting their own way. You (GSU council) have lost all your power to question them tonight."

CUP president Susan Johnson delivered some messages from student papers around Canada including the Manitoban, the Ubyssy, the Chevron and the Sheaf. Each message condemned the action of the GSU executive in ignoring the CUP report and dismissing Horvath.

Johnson pointed out to GSU members the implications of the executive's actions and asked the GSU members whether they wanted a "house organ" or a student newspaper.

"If you don't want a student newspaper that begins to look and act like any other CUP paper, then say so," stated Johnson.

Casey responded to the CUP commission report saying, "When we found the results of the investigation and the kind of investigation taking place, all of us began to deeply question what kind of principles, if any, we held in common with CUP."

Casey continued his criticism of the three-man commission and their method of evaluation.

"I have serious doubts as to whether the brief we submitted was even read," he concluded.

Amidst growing disorder and heckles from the crowd of spectators, the motion to reinstate Horvath was then raised and defeated as the number of GSU members dwindled from 32 to 21 in the early hours of the morning.

After voting against the motion, GSU member Brian Revan claimed that the executive has been "subjected to personal attacks."

"The CUP report substantiates all the allegations made against Horvath," he continued. "I voted against this motion because it was a spurious motion."

After the motion to re-instate Horvath was defeated, another GSU member raised a motion to suggest that a committee be formed to implement all the CUP recommendations, except the reinstatement of Horvath.

The motion passed.

University governors playing hookey

By KATHY CANTY

Students who have missed a lot of classes this year can rest easy. They're in good company.

Absenteeism is also a fact of life at Governing Council meetings. Among the greatest offenders in the corridors of power this year were Sonja Sinclair, a consultant for Price Waterhouse Associates, and Ross Baxter, a professor of Pharmacy at U of T.

According to the minutes of Governing Council meetings, these members managed to attend only two of the seven meetings held from September 15 to February 16.

Sinclair, a government appointee, was not available for comment. Baxter, however, explained that he was out of town for a long period of time this year, and had "other conflicts" in his time table. He added that he tries to attend every meeting he can.

Other members who lose marks for poor attendance are associate professor of medicine William Meakin, Greek Orthodox Bishop Sotirios Athanassoulas and former Globe and Mail reporter Janet Underwood.

"I have to be out of town every second month," explained Meakin. He has to commute to a patient care clinic in Sault Ste. Marie. "I would prefer not to miss meetings but that's the way it is," he added.

"I have been extremely busy," said government appointee Bishop Sotirios. "That's why I haven't accepted another appointment." In September he was in Greece and in January he had travelled to South America, said Bishop Sotirios.

Underwood, another government appointee, said that she was away with her husband for two months at Christmas. "When I'm in town I go to every meeting I possibly can." Underwood said that she will be resigning in June to spend time with her husband who will soon retire.

Three other government appointees are also eligible for the proverbial tap on the wrist. Gordon Fisher, president of Southam Press, John Bassett, president of CFTO and Rudolph Bratty, a senior partner in a Toronto law firm have all made it to three out of seven.

TYP program enrolment falls but student morale still good

By ANDREW RETTIG

Students in the Transitional Year Program (TYP) may be fewer than program organizers had hoped for this year, but their morale is high, said TYP organizer Marty Wall.

"We're not getting through the percentage we'd like," said Wall. He said, however, that the program has been going well — "It's terrific."

The Transitional Year Program began in 1970 and was reactivated last September after a one-year suspension resulting from a committee investigation's description of the program as "suffering from Marxist influence, racial tension and incompetent teaching." It had 35 students but enrolment is down to approximately 25 through attrition. Maximum enrolment in the program is 50.

The program is designed to enable students who withdrew from earlier high school studies because of financial or social problems to gain entrance to U of T.

Wall said students are re-introduced to the academic world through an intense tutorial system which stresses essay writing and other basic scholarly activities.

Wall said that it was too early to tell if all the TYP students would go on to university. A lot depends on the final exams, he said.

"Those who are doing fairly well intend quite strongly to come to U of T," said Wall. "Others who aren't as happy with academic life as they had thought they would be are making other plans."

When asked why the program was suspended in September 1976, Wall said the "Crowe report (the findings of the three-man investigation committee led by York University professor Harry Crowe) was the justification for the shut-down."

Wall said that although a later task force led by Father Kelly of St. Michael's College discredited some of Crowe's claims, the previous program did have some problems.

"There wasn't a clear line of authority" which led to administrative conflicts, Wall said.

Scar Council reps scolded

By REGINA HICKL-SZABO

A letter to all members of the Scarborough College Council slamming them for poor attendance at council meetings was issued by council chairman Andrew Patenall March 15.

Patenall upbraids the 300 council members, 225 of whom have full-time academic appointments, for failing to achieve quorum of 20 at the March 7 monthly meeting.

Patenall said in his letter that the "considerable authority" wielded by the council is in a "process of degeneration that is depressing and potentially dangerous."

Patenall points out that faculty's abdication of an "imperative responsibility to ensure that the academic community be governed by academics" may lead to a "vacuum in which we will be governed by fiat, popular taste and an exaltation of cost effectiveness; all of which run counter to the nurture of a university."

Patenall proceeds to describe a small number of faculty as "full-time members in the matter of salary alone." He related some of the "horror stories" which abound at Scarborough: teaching loads of four hours or less, minimal work being demanded in courses, arrogant disregard for planning of curriculum and failure to provide adequate consultation and guidance to individual students.

"These are the most livid symptoms of a malaise which has now crippled the working of College Council," said Patenall.

The chairman urged members of the Scarborough College Council to participate in their own government "before someone else does it for us." He urged chairmen of divisions to be "more than budget officers and moderators" and to provide "some visible and significant leadership in ensuring that individual responsibilities are fulfilled with the same vigor with which privileges are enjoyed."

Patenall explained in a telephone interview yesterday the feeble turnout at the March 7 meeting with a chuckle. "Administration isn't glamorous."

Joan Foley, principal of Scarborough College, said failure to achieve quorum is "not unusual at this time of year." Both she and Patenall expect a better turnout for the council's next meeting April 6.

Trinity wants a provost

By CAROLINE CONNELL

The search for a new provost for Trinity College has been so far unsuccessful. A 12-member search committee consisting of faculty, students, and alumni has been working for the past few months to find a replacement for retiring provost George Ignatieff. The committee, with Trinity Chancellor The Most Reverend H. H. Clark as chairman, has so far failed to come up with a suitable candidate, although several interviews have been conducted.

Ignatieff's term officially ends on July 1, 1978, and the college had hoped to announce a new appointment to be effective on that date. However, Ignatieff has agreed to stay until the end of December. Vice-provost Alexander Dalzell will then take over as acting provost until July 1, 1979, when the committee hopes the new provost will be able to take office.

The search committee, with its membership slightly changed, is continuing its task. The deferred date will allow more time for a suitable choice to be made, according to Clark.

Referendum next year

Radio may break away

By GEORGE COOK

U of T Radio, formerly Radio Varsity, may strike out on its own next year — if students agree to foot the bill.

"It would cost about $30,000," U of T Radio current manager Mike Wescott said. "That would allow us to operate for a reasonable length of time, at least until the date for reacquisition for a license in three years," he added.

The decision on whether or not to fund the station would go to students in a referendum next fall.

Student Council president-elect Brian Hill says he is "not opposed to the idea" of a radio station for the university. "But the major decision will be left up to people on campus," he said.

If U of T Radio gets the money, they can apply to the CRTC for a low-power FM license. If granted the license, the station will be able to broadcast to students on the St. George campus and to the surrounding community.

Next year, barring increased funds for the station, U of T Radio will be operating on about $3,500. An extra $1,500 will go to improving and expanding the existing direct line system.

There are currently speakers at University College, Hart House, the Students' Administrative Council building and the SAC media building.

Westcott said he hopes to expand next year into the campus co-ops, Woodsworth College, the Engineering Society building and perhaps Victoria and St. Michael's Colleges.

LOSER WINS

Last Thursday's decision by the General Council of the Graduate Students' Union to uphold the Executive's firing of Grad Post editor Maria Horvath may well be the beginning of the end for the GSU executive.

The GSU executive might have gotten itself a house organ but in order to get it the executive has stooped so low that it will find it impossible to rise above the filth again. So busy were GSU Vice-President Leo Casey, President Bill Stratton and their lackeys throwing mud at Maria Horvath that they failed to notice that they were drowning in it themselves.

The way the vote went, 11 to 10 against reinstatement, with the whole executive (6 people) voting as a block against reinstatement, was illuminating all by itself. That the executive could only muster 5 votes in its favour as compared to double that number against testifies to how isolated the executive has been in this case.

The accused was fired one day before the General Council meeting. Had it not been for the New Post—a fact sheet hastily put together by supporters of Horvath—almost nobody would have known about the firing. The agenda for the meeting only said "personnel matter—closed session". Due process demands that the accused be considered innocent until she is proven guilty. The GSU executive, however, quick as it is to invoke legalism when it wants to stifle debate, felt that due process was superfluous in this case, perhaps because this was intended to be a hatchet job in the first place. So Horvath was fired before she even had a chance to state her case. But still when it came to a vote there were council members who had moral qualms about voting for reinstatement. Goodness gracious that would have meant censuring the executive! How could they do that without knowing "all the facts" as one of them put it at the meeting. No, better fire Horvath without knowing all the facts than censure the executive.

Let's talk about the facts.

The GSU "brief" at the meeting presented no new charges or evidence that had not already been presented to and reviewed by the CUP Commission of Inquiry. And unlike the GSU General Council the Commission had two weeks, not a few hours, to examine the charges. The Commission in its interim report (the GSU executive could not wait till the final report came out) reported that there were no grounds for dismissal. On top of this Horvath replied in detail to the GSU Executive's charges and her reply was not contested by anyone. The only argument against Horvath was that the recommendations made by the CUP Commission could only be carried out at a great deal of expense. But as soon as Horvath's purge was ratified a motion was put through to strike a committee to investigate the implementation of the CUP recommendations, a self-contradictory motion in light of the fact that one of the recommendations was that Horvath not be fired.

But what use is logic when all you want to do is get rid of an editor and take over the paper?

These are just some of the highlights of a meeting that was a circus from beginning to end. Nobody could have done as good a job of destroying whatever credibility the GSU executive still has as the executive itself.

The funny thing was that at the end of last Thursday's meeting nobody was as exuberant as the "losers". When the "winners" have made such asses of themselves, who wouldn't be exuberant?

a reply here. Those who want to hear the full story as well as an analysis of the March 16 demo should come to a meeting today at 3:00 at the International Students' Centre. Following an introduction by myself and Peter Rosenthal the meeting will discuss how to best follow up on the March 16 demonstration.

Feelings of disgust

It was with feelings of incredulity and disgust that I read Professor D. Goldstick's letter on "the myth of official Soviet antisemitism" in the March 17 Varsity. I find it truly wondrous how Communist apologists can continually come up with rationales which purport to show that well-documented violations of basic human rights in the Soviet Union are merely inventions of troublemaking outsiders.

While attending a scientific conference in Moscow in 1966, I took the opportunity to attend the synagogue, and to talk to crowds of Russian Jews who spontaneously surrounded me in the street afterwards in a desire to communicate. Among other things, I learned that they were classified officially as a separate nationality in the Soviet Union, but were also denied many of the basic rights afforded the other official nationalities, the right of representation in the Soviet of Nationalities, the right to have newspapers, theater, or education for their children in their own language, and more. And this was in 1966, before emigration attempts were made.

Some years later I talked with some Russian emigrants in Israel and learned that conditions had become much worse for Jews in the USSR. For one thing, the constant vicious anti-Israel propaganda in the Soviet media was perceived to be giving official condonation and approval to antisemitism in the country. I also learned of the oft-times years of hardship inflicted on those people who had the temerity to seek to leave the country in which they were being racially vilified.

These experiences were reinforced when I heard an emigrant Russian Jewish scientist speak, here at the U. of T., on what happens when one expresses a desire to leave Russia. One's job is taken away, one's colleagues are forced to denounce the "disident" at regular staff meetings or risk losing their positions as well, and, in a catch-22 of Soviet invention, because the person is now unemployed he risks being imprisoned as a parasite.

In addition to all of the above, one would have to be extremely insular not to be aware of the official persecution of Scharansky and the other Jewish "refuseniks" whose sole crime is a desire to leave a country where they are not allowed to be Jewish.

Despite the well-known difficulties attending the application for emigration, fully 7-8% (using Goldstick's figures) of the Jewish population of Russia has managed to emigrate; the whole knowing they were leaving situations that were economically more favorable than anything they were likely to find elsewhere, and entering what, after generations spent in the USSR, must be a highly alien society. To me, this denotes an intense desire to leave, not withstanding the terrible difficulties, in order to escape perceived racial oppression. To Goldstick this somehow-or-other indicates that "the majority of Jews in fact desire to stay in their country notwithstanding all that outsiders have done to create trouble between themselves and their fellow-citizens."

Professor Goldstick appears to require no dialogue with Russian Jews nor first-hand evidence to know what the truth is or what the majority of Soviet Jews want. He needs only his own intuition and the official Party line to realize that claims of repression and of State-incited racial hatred in the Soviet Union are simply lies spread by outsiders with the intention of preventing peace. I'm afraid that the only thing Professor Goldstick's letter has convinced me of is that if you give higher education to a moron, what you get is an educated moron.

Varsity opposed

Throughout this academic year, the Varsity has maintained an editorial posture of unremitting opposition to the GSU executive. It can be expected that the editorial of March 22 will be assessed in this context. But interested bystanders are in a less favorable position in evaluating the Varsity's reputedly factual reporting. As a member of the Graduate Association of Students in Political Science (GASPS), I am one of the few who have signed the petition which called the GASPS general meeting of March 21, I should like to respond to the Varsity's distorted account of that event. For reasons known only to himself, Andrew Mahon did not report the substance of the final motion passed by GASPS members. Yet its only shoddy reporting which enables the author of the Varsity editorial to claim so self-righteously that the purpose of our meeting was "to gag" Tom Kuhn, and that motions to that effect were "rammed through" a "stacked" meeting.

At the meeting Mr. Kuhn readily admitted that his role in the GSU-Grad Post affair should be regarded as an expression of his personal views rather than as GASPS policy. At no time did any member of GASPS dispute the right of any individual to make his views public. Those of us who petitioned for the meeting, citing Kuhn's Feb. 22 letter to the Varsity and his distribution of petitions from the GASPS office, believed that our president's statements quite clearly implied that he spoke not only for himself, but for GASPS. To discourage this misrepresentation, we acted to advise both Mr. Kuhn and those who have read his statements that GASPS members do not subscribe either to his account of the pertinent facts or to his evaluation of the same. This is merely to say that we informed our representatives of the views of the overwhelming majority of his constituents.

Both the editors of the Varsity and the public should be advised that in so instructing its representative the GASPS membership acted under Article III, section III of the GASPS constitution. Anyone familiar with the GASPS constitution or the practices which commonly govern deliberative bodies will know immediately that rules regarding quorum prevent vocal minorities from "ramming through" motions. Apparently, the Varsity editorialist is unaware of the fact that each motion passed at the March 21 meeting (including one which challenged a ruling of the chair) was supported by between 2% and 3 times the number of members which is constitutionally sufficient to form a quorum. Unfathomably, he implies that decisions of the GASPS membership, deriving from an uncommonly large general meeting and sanctioned by accepted rules of order, represent merely the vendetta of a few self-interested conspirators.

Perhaps it is unreasonable to expect that the competence of Varsity contributors will extend to an understanding of rudimentary democratic procedures. Yet the appropriate standards of journalistic behavior should be within their grasp. Taken together, the Varsity's news reports and editorial of March 22 must be interpreted as a calculated affront to GASPS and each of its members.

Shed some light

Since the Varsity has seen fit to raise the question of the March 16 demonstration marshals restraining a charge on the legislative building ("Our Cops Are Tops", Friday, March 17 1978) I believe that the readers of the Varsity may find that the following facts shed some light on the situation and on the "sell-out".

- 1) On the Wednesday night before the Thursday demonstration a meeting was held on the fifth floor of the Sidney Smith building in which plans were made by a small group of people, including Varsity editor Mario Cutajar, to disrupt the next day's actions.
- 2) Specific plans were made to disrupt the speeches of the student representatives, in particular, the speech of Graduate Students Union vice-president Leo Casey at the Convocation Hall gathering and the speech of Ontario Federation of Students chairperson Miriam Edelson at the Queen's Park rally. The group was unable to reach the stage at Convocation Hall because of the crowding of the aisles, but experienced more success at Queen's Park, where Edelson's speech was disrupted.

- 3) The organizers of the demonstration were informed of the plans to disrupt the rally and charge the steps of the legislative building soon after the Wednesday night meeting. So were the Ontario Provincial police, who assembled a full battalion of not police, completely equipped, inside the legislative building, and the Metro Toronto police, who had a squad of motorcycle police behind the legislative building. The organizers of the demonstration made sure that those who planned to storm Queen's Park were made aware of the preparation of the police.

- 4) Rather than deterring such a disruption, this information seemed to encourage it. The organizers of the demonstration felt that if such a disruption was successful, a battle with the police would ensue and many innocent people would be hurt. (As it was a few people were nearly trampled in the charge.) In addition, past experience has shown that in the case of a successful disruption, it is the disruption itself, and not the issues the demonstration is focused upon, which receives the coverage. Needless to note, such coverage is never good and hence does much damage to the cause. On these bases a decision was made to have the marshals restrain any attempt at a disruption.
- 5) The charge was made during Edelson's speech and Varsity editor Cutajar, layout editor McMillan, letters to the editor writer Joe Fletcher, and mathematics professor Peter Rosenthal were all involved. The marshals held the line until the demonstration had dispersed and then left the group of disrupters to face the police themselves. Suddenly, their desire to "meet with Bill Davis" in person disappeared. They left.
- 6) Finally, all of those whom Cutajar accused of selling out put hours of volunteer work into the organization of the rally. While Cutajar did nothing himself.

Irresponsible journalism is not very far from irresponsible politics. But now the Varsity is playing with more than the reputations of its fellow students; it is playing with their very physical safety.

Unworthy of honor

Although I am flattered to have made Joe Fletcher's list of errant students' leaders (March 17), I am unworthy of such an honor. At no time during last Thursday's demonstration was I a student marshal. Neither did I, at any time, "join forces with the police in order to stop the students", though I gladly would have done so had the haranguing of the more radical demonstrators incited the crowd to violence. The fact is, once I had advanced to the front of the crowd, I simply turned around to see what everyone else was doing. It was then that the wild-eyed and hysterical Mr. Fletcher accosted me, and accused me of "standing up for what I believe in." When I gave him my name, I half expected that it would be used improperly.

Mr. Fletcher's actions are typical of those irresponsible, starchy-eyed revolutionaries who favoured a violent conclusion to the rally over a peaceful one. Perhaps Mr. Fletcher was looking for a Bastille to storm. Or maybe a Kent State?

Student tantrum

I am writing this letter in protest of moves made by students on behalf of the university community, with little or no regard for the image of that community, and without authorization of the student body.

Twelve students and staff members of this university occupied Dr. Evans' office for two days "to dramatize the adverse effects of government cutbacks on the quality of post-secondary education and to publicize the March 16 anti-cutbacks demonstration". I suggest that the quality of education for which they are concerned would be improved if more time were given to learning and teaching, and less to dramatizing and publicizing. The occupiers demanded full support of their stand against cutbacks by President Evans and President-elect Ham. What right have a handful of people to decide the policy of two individuals such that the policy of the university is implied? Those who argue for a free and democratic voice in community affairs must be prepared to grant that same freedom of expression to others. To do less is hypocrisy.

Another demand issued by the occupiers was that "Governing Council halt all cutbacks in academic programs, services, academic and support staff and library maintenance." There is only one problem — the funding is not available. In a time where the country as a whole is experiencing restraint, it is unreasonable to expect exemption of the universities from this policy simply because some students throw a tantrum.

In the eyes of the public, this "peaceful invasion" was and will be regarded as the attitude of a generation spoiled by affluence — an unfavourable view at best

Possibly the most objectionable of recent events was the Rally at Queen's Park on March 16. The decision to endorse the demonstration and specifically to aid in its funding was made at the General Assembly meeting held March 6. It was openly admitted that quorum was not attained. Perhaps the lack of quorum can be partially attributed to the choice of time for the meeting. Admittedly, a certain amount of apathy is present in any group, but I'm sure many students were, as I was, engaged in important lectures, labs, or tutorials at 3:00 p.m. Surely scheduling a meeting during regular class hours is unfair to the majority of the student body.

I think the situation is analogous to that of the straw and the camel's back. For me, the last straw was applied while walking through Queen's Park and the surrounding area on the morning of March 17. The grounds maintenance crew was hard at work at 8:00 a.m., with every indication of having been at work for some time, as can be attested to by the number of filled garbage containers. To those students who persist in the belief that post-secondary education is their God-given right, I submit that it is NOT their right to willfully and wantonly render a public place unfit for public use. I can only hope that a bill for cleanup will be presented to the Ontario Federation of Students, in order that they may assume some responsibility for their actions.

Social justice

Through a misunderstanding I did not join the walk-out of students at the last meeting of the Governing Council, and this turned out to my advantage as it allowed me to hear something student governor P. Ryan had to say.

He expressed concern over the social injustice inherent in the difference between levels of remuneration both in money and in work satisfaction, for the two kinds of workers in our society, the so-called white collar workers and those engaged in monotonous, disagreeable jobs.

I was heartened to hear this attitude articulated, and I wish that you could print all that Ryan said on the subject. It might be useful to add to this report an extension of the same attitude. People who perform dull, disagreeable jobs also deserve respect and consideration. Nobody has yet invented a machine that would collect garbage and empty waste baskets. To scatter garbage over the ground and furniture, and to throw into waste baskets containers half full of liquids, as people obviously do in places like the lobby of Sidney Smith Hall, is insulting to the workers who have to clear up the mess.

To follow a variation on the same theme, I simply must express amazement at your paper's treatment of the student marshals during the March 16 demonstration. Do you really believe that the storming of Queen's Park would have been in the best interest of the students? Do you think that the workers of Ontario would support undisciplined, anarchical behaviour? And that such behaviour would prompt the taxpayers to urge Premier Davis to listen to the students? Please, think again.

The Proud Twelve

We are writing with respect to the series of articles, editorials, and letters appearing in the Friday issue of The Varsity concerning the actions of the Ontario Federation of Students, the Graduate Students' Union, the Students' Administrative Council, and the parade marshals at the March 16th demonstration.

As the twelve occupiers of President Evans' office, many of us were proud to act as parade marshals at the March 16th demonstration and feel somewhat slighted that Joe Fletcher omitted our names from the list of individuals who prevented a small lunatic fringe from provoking a battle with the police.

As individuals who organized for two straight weeks to make the March 16th demonstration the success it was, we find it quite revealing that those who led the charge, including Varsity Editor-in-Chief Mario Cularaj and Varsity Layout Editor Eric McMillan, had done absolutely no organizing to build for that demonstration. But it is certainly consistent with their actions throughout this year: they remain, as they were last Thursday, a small group of ultra-left fanatics without the slightest regard for the most elementary democratic processes and without a fraction of the support of the "masses and masses of students" whom they so ineffectually claim to represent. And as always their ultra-leftism moves those who wish to discredit our cause, our demonstration, and the student movement more than anything Dr. Parrott or Dr. Evans could possibly do.

NEW PRESIDENT FACES TIGHT $$

"We are particularly interested in widening our base of decision making," Brian Hill, newly-elected SAC President, said yesterday. "We want more people — new people — to get involved with SAC. But they will have to deal with the same situation that all newly-elected members of SAC have to deal with. We have to recognize the fact that we have not received a fee increase and that we have to prepare for the future. I, along with everyone else at SAC, am dedicated to doing the very best that we can under this restraining set of circumstances. Some people have expressed the view that SAC will not be able to function under the condition of restraint in which it now finds itself; by next fall we should know what exactly is and is not possible."

Concern over the loss of the fees referendum in the March 16th election was shown in the budget recommendations by the SAC executive. The recommendations will go before the SAC Board of Directors for approval tonight. The meeting is scheduled for 7 pm at the Governing Council Chambers in Simcoe Hall. Everyone is urged to attend.

SAC's executive took a careful look at all of SAC's programs and decided that budgetary restraints made it mandatory to stop funding less-effective programs. But it was also decided to keep a level of effective funding to those programs that are considered essential. Cuts are seen necessary for the downtown folk series, the Room Arounds, the Spirit And Sports Program, the SAC Survival Kit, the SAC Page, and conference budget allocations. As well one full-time staff position will be eliminated. All of these items are open for further review at this evening's meeting. Quite obviously a very intense debate is expected. See you tonight at what promises to be a most interesting meeting.

FRESH APPROACH ON HORIZON

"We've got to keep up the pressure on cutbacks," Mark McElwain, newly-elected SAC Vice-President said recently. "I am committed to some real progress on this issue. Exactly what we do depends on the response of the government to the demonstration held on March 16th. Over the summer the members of SAC Board of Directors will develop a strategy that the government will not be able to ignore."

The March 16th demonstration at Queen's Park against cutbacks, a grossly inadequate student-aid plan, and the current student unemployment crisis was a grand success. SAC was happy to see so many people turn out and we want to thank all of the people who put so much time and effort into making the demonstration what it was. It seemed to most that approximately 1,500 U of T students were at Queen's Park that day, so those who were involved in the organization of the massive effort can feel justly proud.

The demonstration clearly showed to the government of Ontario that students do not accept the underfunding of the university system.

"The press coverage for the demonstration was phenomenal," McElwain said. "The new SAC Board of Directors can be confident that it has a mandate to act on this issue and that its actions will not go unnoticed. Work against university cutbacks will be SAC's number one priority in the coming year. I want people to drop into SAC and tell me what they want to see done," McElwain concluded.

7 COMMISSIONERS CHOSEN TONIGHT

At tonight's meeting, the SAC Board of Directors will choose SAC's seven commissioners. SAC operates through its commissions: each commission is responsible for one distinct area of SAC's activities. Each makes recommendations to the executive and the Board of Directors, executes its own and SAC's policies, and plays a primary role in helping to set up a budget. Each of the seven commissions is made up equally of members of the SAC Board of Directors and any student who wishes to join.

"I would like to urge any interested student to join one of SAC's commissions," Reva Sober, newly-elected SAC Vice-President, said. "Involvement and participation in SAC is not limited to the elected members of the Board of Directors alone."

A brief rundown of the seven SAC commissions and their roles in the operation of the Students' Administrative Council is as follows:

Services: Responsible for planning all of SAC's entertainment and recreational programs.

Education: Looks to maintain the quality of education at the university.

External: Deals with all organizations outside of the university, for example, all three levels of government.

Communications: Handles activities related to promotion and all of SAC's campus media.

Women's: Discusses the special issues facing women on and off campus.

University Government: Responsible for student involvement in the governing of the university.

Finance: Plans the internal budgetary process at SAC.

If you are interested in the work of any of these commissions, drop in at tonight's meeting or stop by the SAC Building at 12 Hart House Circle.

Unhappy effects

The dismissal of Maria Horvath as editor of the Grad Post with only a few issues remaining this year can be expected to have a number of unhappy effects on the Graduate Students' Union.

First, it will clearly be very difficult to find qualified journalists to run the paper in the future. It is now patent to all that the Grad Post is under the control of the GSU Exec, a body whose experience and interests are political rather than journalistic. No self-respecting journalist would accept responsibility for a publication thus controlled, and we can expect to see a Grad Post reduced in the future to the level of hackwork. The GSU Exec, far more than its alleged incompetence of the editor's will have accomplished that.

Further, the GSU as a whole has lost a great deal of legitimacy. An influential segment of its Exec has been shown to be nothing more than moral thugs who, however they explain their motives to themselves, have allowed themselves to be distracted from issues of real concern to graduate students by the pursuit of a shabby and unnecessary vendetta. The GSU cannot easily survive this sort of thing. The attitude on the part of University administrators and others has been, over the years, that the GSU represents nothing more than a clique which votes itself into power over the apathy of most grad students. The sheer ineptitude with which the Exec has behaved can only reinforce this impression, and undermines whatever legitimacy previous GSU administrations have won.

As one who has worked both for the GSU (in General Council and on the Exec) and the Grad Post, I am deeply saddened to see both so harmed. I resist the mournful conclusion that grad students, by their apathy, have brought upon themselves the kind of bumbling, impotent organisation they deserve. I hope that strong action on the part of General Council towards setting up a truly independent Grad Post, and intelligent voting by the grad students in the upcoming GSU elections will begin to undo some of the damage done to both organisations — and to Maria Horvath.

John McCumber

the Cacophony

At the risk of their getting lost in the confusion surrounding the Grad Post business, I'd like to make a couple of remarks about the issues of 'freedom of the press' and autonomy from student councils, and what these have to do with the Grad Post.

The former is clearly a 'motherhood' issue;

all parties to the dispute preach about it even if they don't practice it, and yet another sermon on it is redundant at this point. But the editorials that have appeared in the Varsity, both the ones on the Editorial Page and the ones in the news stories, have ignored one point about the latter issue. With all due respect for the opinions of CUP and The Varsity, the relationship the Grad Post has to the Graduate Students' Union is not identical with the relationship The Varsity has to SAC. Thus the degree of autonomy that each paper has to its respective student organisation should not be the same, but must reflect these essential differences.

The Varsity is produced by a large number of students. A few donate a large amount of time to their jobs, and hence rightly receive some money for their service. A larger number, however, donate smaller amounts of time, and hence can afford to fit their Varsity duties in with their other activities as students. The same, alas, is not true of the Grad Post. Graduate students, by and large, already have other activities besides their course work, these, etc.: e.g., teaching, worrying about the depressing job market. Perhaps, some might argue, they are even more apathetic than undergrads. At any rate, hardly any grad students help out with the operations of the paper for a few hours a week. Thus, these jobs fall to the editor. The job is, as Ms. Horvath discovered, a demanding, full-time one. Now, since it is unlikely that any grad student can get permission to take a year out from his or her studies to edit the Grad Post (whereas the editor of The Varsity can do this), it is most likely that the editor of the former will not be a grad student. Thus we have the situation that existed with the Grad Post: The editor, not herself a member of the constituency she serves, runs the paper almost single-handedly; with very little assistance from people who are members.

Now, suppose that The Varsity had similar problems, and SAC had to hire professional journalists to put the paper out. Would it then be rational for SAC to grant The Varsity the same degree of autonomy it presently has? Likewise, it would be equally irresponsible for the Graduate Student's Union to grant the Grad Post the same degree of autonomy the Varsity has. Especially with respect to such matters as advertising policy, bookkeeping, and other matters not directly concerned with editorial policy, it makes obvious sense for the GSU Council, as the elected representatives of grad students, to keep an eye on these matters.

What I have said so far is not intended to justify the actions taken by the GSU Council with respect to Ms. Horvath. I raise these points because they are part of the story that needs to be told by those who seek to justify or condemn these actions, and so far they've been ignored by both parties in the dispute, in favour of what they take to be better weapons for the present battles.

Finally, there is the question of CUP kicking the Grad Post out over this issue. It seems an open question whether this would be a bad thing. After all, the Varsity is a member, and it appears three times per week, as opposed to (often) every second week. If the Varsity cannot publish all the interesting news from CUP before a stale version of the story can appear in the Grad Post, then we have problems with more newspapers than we originally thought. And eliminating the CUP stories would solve the perennial problem the Grad Post faces in finding space in the paper for coverage of campus events. But, most importantly, if CUP cannot recognize the special situation of the Grad Post without compromising the basic principles for which it stands, then this just shows that both are better off going their separate ways.

Ostry new VUSAC prexy

By CHARLES MEISTER

The new Victoria University Student Administrative Council (VUSAC) president is Adam Ostry, a third-year political economy student who won the March 22 election by a vote of 225-211 over opponent Clive Veroni.

Ostry said in an interview that while he is a "relative outsider" to the council, "I feel it is time someone gave a fresh, objective look at how council should be run and which direction it should take." Ostry plans to broaden the responsibilities of VUSAC beyond those of services. He wants an increased number of policy statements from the council on issues affecting the entire U of T community. One of his major aims is to provide the impetus for a mass lobby group of college and university student presidents to fight politicians and their policies. He views solidarity as the most advantageous means of opposing financial cutbacks to universities. The present Council of University Presidents "doesn't do anything," Ostry asserted.

Ostry rejected the recent proposal to allow the Students' Administrative Council (SAC) representatives from Victoria College to vote at VUSAC meetings. His election platform included the plank that "VUSAC is an autonomous council alongside SAC, St. Mike's and Trinity. I intend to keep it this way, especially in terms of services, which I feel VUSAC is better equipped to handle vis-a-vis Vic students than is SAC." Nevertheless Ostry had no objections to an "information sharing" arrangement with SAC and other administrative bodies.

Ostry regarded the March 16 anti-cutbacks demonstration at Queen's Park as "marginally successful" but is disappointed that Premier Bill Davis and Harry Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities, remained absent. Concerning accusations that the demonstration's organizers over-pollinated students, Ostry said he was "disgusted at the way the student leaders acted," but conceded that they were faced with a "moral dilemma."

Ostry agreed that the demonstration served to focus attention on cutbacks and initiated the wheels of action. He said that "apathy is starting to give way to a more conscientious approach to student affairs."

Ostry said a "redefinition of priorities" is necessary at both the federal and provincial government levels and that "fiscal rearrangement" is necessary for education. He is opposed to the new regulations for the Ontario Student Aid Plan (OSAP) and fears that university will become more elitist than it already is. He advocates a differential fee system for students according to parental income. He also feels that for visa students "differential fees are a form of racial discrimination." Since Canada provides very little aid to third world countries he emphasizes that "the only thing we can share is our education."

During the past year Ostry has written several articles for The Varsity both in French and English. He believes that French should be made compulsory for entrance to university. "The people of Ontario are very reactionary when it comes to French language education."

Other VUSAC winners are Susan Bertoia, vice-president, Nancy Hadley, finance commissioner and Hugh Reid, education commissioner. The remaining positions were acclaimed.

UNLOCK IT MINI STORAGE

WHAT IS MINI-STORAGE?

Mini-storage is a new concept.

It is a practical, inexpensive way of safely storing things not presently in use. It features individual, private lockers of different sizes, where owners can store goods themselves, lock the door, and retain possession of the key.

Household and business items can be kept conveniently out of the way on a monthly rental basis, with daily access to them if necessary.

The rapid growth of mini-storage south of the border attests to the need for this type of practical space in our modern cities.

UNLOCK IT MINI STORAGE is the first such facility in Toronto. We look forward to growing with and serving the needs of our community.

Mario Cutajar, Editor '77 - '78:

'To me, the first priority is politics'

By MARK LUKASIEWICZ
Features Editor

"To me, the first priority is politics."

— Mario Cutajar,
Varsity Editor-in-Chief,
1977-1978

This statement perhaps best sums up the turbulent and controversial editorship of Mario Cutajar, who was narrowly elected to that post last year in a hotly contested campaign. Winding up his term, Cutajar can reflect upon a year marked by threatened lawsuits, outraged students and dissent from within and without the Varsity.

Cutajar was never popular with his sub-editors (the seven full and part-time student employees who work under him), nor they with him, and this caused him significant problems from the outset; the result was poor communications, missed production deadlines, and editorials bearing the editor's signature, indicating that they represented only the editor's opinion. Simmering dissatisfaction surfaced in late October with a bid by some staffers to move "non-confidence" in the editor. The move was defeated by a Varsity staff meeting.

In spite of its internal problems, Cutajar believes the Varsity was at least partly successful. "To me, successful means being able to make people think. I think in that sense the Varsity has been successful; I wouldn't say as successful as I would have liked it to be."

Cutajar believes that the duty of the writer is somewhat like "forcing people into corners; if they want to be reactionaries, fine - but let them know that they are being reactionaries." Cutajar says that this philosophy should prevail on the news pages as well as the editorial page: "I think the rest of the paper should do it. Most stories should be ones in which the reader actually decides for himself who's right and who's wrong."

'Information and its dissemination is a great source of power.'

"The paper is a weapon; information and the dissemination of it is a great source of power... to fight something you have to know about it; the Varsity can shine a spotlight," says Cutajar.

Internal Conflicts

Cutajar says the Varsity was not entirely successful on this score "because not everybody shares my opinion." Cutajar describes this as "an ongoing debate - a struggle, really - in the Varsity to see which view predominates. Right now it's an unstable mixture of both."

Late in October, Cutajar narrowly retained his editorship when a vote of non-confidence was introduced at a staff meeting. Cutajar believes that the "main reason was political" in the attempted ouster. "Another reason was that there were serious personality conflicts. I think, between the sub-editors."

Although Cutajar says he is happy he was not removed, the solution arrived at was not wholly satisfactory. "I think it didn't succeed because enough people agreed with my politics. In a certain sense, the fact that it did not succeed is not totally satisfactory because it did not succeed, again, because of personalities. My friends sided with me, and other people's friends sided with other people. That's not totally satisfactory. I was very happy it didn't succeed, but it would have been far better if the politics had come out much more and it had been a political discussion."

The Varsity's editorial page has never failed to raise controversy this year. Reaction has ranged from praise and commendation to outrage and contempt. But this didn't bother Cutajar.

"To me it is very important to be controversial. Being controversial is good, because it makes people justify their positions. If you are against what I say in my editorials, presumably you have to justify your repugnance to them. If, as I think, your opinions are wrong, presumably when you try to justify them you won't find any justification, and you might change them - or else, if you persist in them, I can expose you as a demagogue."

Cutajar dismisses out of hand the proposition that the Varsity's editorials should expound the predominant student viewpoint.

"Who's to say what is the predominant view? Challenge the predominant view, and if you're good enough at it, yours will become the predominant view."

"Again, people outside can participate in the paper. This is why I joined; I joined the paper because I was interested in politics and I wanted to propagate a certain type of politics - other people can do that."

Priorities and Professionalism

A large part of Cutajar's problems within the Varsity stemmed from his lack of concern and involvement with technical and financial aspects of the newspaper. This is a problem that Cutajar says he recognizes, but doesn't apologize for:

"I do tend to typify the

The Varsity - Mark Lukasiewicz

Cutajar tended to ignore administration and finances.

unpractical intellectual. It's very easy to get that image, and I haven't really ever tried to fight it, because one thing that I really disliked last year was the anti-intellectual atmosphere in the Varsity."

"I tend to take technical things lightly: I tend to say, 'Well, OK, we'll get the paper out, fine...' and not worry much about when and how you do it. I think that did create problems, because the prevalent philosophy of the paper being one of a professional paper, within that context an attitude like the one I have doesn't fit."

"I don't apologize for that... to a certain extent the paper runs itself. I think that's very important to realize, because you might not pay a bill immediately, but eventually you do end up paying it because you can't help it. And as long as the paper can still come out and you're not going to be shut down, to me the first priority is politics and what the paper is going to be doing."

"Now of course if you ignore the finances a lot, you're not going to have the paper at all. But I don't think that happened this year... we're still putting out a paper, and we'll actually not have as big a deficit as last year: with just enough scraping, we won't have any deficit at all. It has worked."

SAC bureaucrats

Traditionally, SAC and the Varsity have worked in an adversary relationship; over the years, successive editors and SAC presidents have battled over a number of student issues - not least among them the role of the Varsity itself. This year proved to be no different.

"When I started, I didn't want to have too many fights with SAC: not because I was scared of them, but because I didn't think it was necessary." But, says Cutajar, his hopes for harmony turned sour after SAC reacted violently to an article which he wrote regarding SAC's negotiations with its unionized employees ("SAC a corporate baron-union" - The Varsity, Nov. 11, 1977).

"From that point, they (SAC members) showed that their latent bureaucratic sentiments stopped being latent and came out very expressly. Tuzyk showed himself to be just as willing as Brian O'Riordan, who is supposed to be fanatically right wing, to take action."

"I came to realize that after the government, the student councils are the main enemy; I mean the student councils as they exist now are the main obstacle to a militant student movement."

And Cutajar doesn't see much hope for the future in this respect: "I think SAC relations will be worse next year, because SAC has if anything moved further to the right." Cutajar says that part of the SAC-Varsity problem stems from the different goals of the two organizations: SAC's emphasis on student services and the Varsity's emphasis on student politics.

Given a chance to "do it all over again," Cutajar says he would like to have paid more attention to "impressions." "I don't really pay attention to impressions, but they are important. I would also want to assume authority from the beginning; I tend not to do that, and that was very bad." But, says Cutajar, "I'd want to do that, but I don't think I could."

Next year Cutajar plans to continue writing, largely within a small "left-wing collective." He says he enjoys "creative writing" (although he abhors the term itself) and would like to write "polemical" pieces of a more blunt and direct sort than he was able to produce within the confines of Varsity editorial policy.

Cutajar feels he was successful in spite of internal staff problems.

George Cook, Editor '78 - '79:

Varsity 'a co-operative venture.'

By MARK LUKASIEWICZ
Features Editor

George Cook, editor-elect of the Varsity, sees the student newspaper as "a co-operative venture."

"In any co-operative venture people have certain propensities and talents, and they also have certain weaknesses. What you try to do, is to maximize peoples' talents and make the best use of them possible."

Cook has written for the Varsity for two years. A student of French, Cook was one of the Varsity's most prolific writers this year, covering news and sports events on and off campus, and writing for the paper's review section. His articles on the Inns College Independent Studies cutbacks raised considerable controversy.

The Varsity editorship is a full-time job, which Cook will begin in May. Over the summer, he will be engaged in streamlining the Varsity filing system and acquiring typesetting equipment for the Varsity.

Cook sees the Varsity's role as being two-fold: "One, a paper that serves students, and helps students, and also a provocative paper, a paper that makes people think and want to become involved in university, and the paper itself."

Varsity democratic

But Cook says that the Varsity's success will depend on more than its editor: "It depends a great deal on the people you're working with — you're working with a lot of people with their own ideas. The Varsity is a democratic paper, so that the staff does make decisions as to what the paper becomes. You're dealing with a lot of variables."

Cook's most visible responsibility as editor-in-chief will be writing the Varsity editorials. What will he write about? "There are things happening on this campus, there are things happening at this university, which demand a response from the newspaper. That response should always be based on a judgement of what is good for the students on campus."

"If our editorials are provocative, well and good, but you don't go out and be provocative for provocation's sake . . . you make a judgement about a specific issue or event and you editorialize about it. If your judgement is provocative, then that's simply what it is. It doesn't demonstrate too much integrity if you're simply going out and being provocative for provocation's sake."

Cook hopes to give the Varsity news pages some "focus" next year. "We have to look at things in total; the main decisions with respect to education are made at Queen's Park. The Governing Council has to be looked at too, but to a certain extent it is a sort of appendage of the province, administering what the province is doing."

"The two most important elements in education at the moment are the province and the student government. I see them as being in rather direct opposition."

For this reason, Cook would like to see student councils assume a more aggressive attitude towards government. "Student councils have been extremely cautious and extremely obliging, really, in their relations with other levels of government. I don't think that they've taken a very consistent or strong stance in support of students on campus."

The two most important elements in education at the moment are the province and student government!

Cook rejects the notion that SAC, in its docility, is representing the majority of students. "I think the poor turnout at the recent elections is ample evidence of that. I think that more would be gained for students by student councils which were more aggressive and stronger than those we've had recently."

But Cook does not see the student councils as enemies. "Ultimately, they are the main ally in a 'fight for a militant student movement'. They're the people with the resources, the time, the organizational capacity, to get students involved with political affairs and problems."

Separation from SAC?

Cook would like to see the Varsity become totally independent from SAC, with its own student levy. "I don't think that the people at SAC understand the Varsity, or how it works in many cases . . . in other cases where they do understand it, I do think that they try, perhaps subtly, to influence it, and in ways that are not quite appropriate. This has happened a number of times this year."

"I expect by the end of next year to have drawn up a detailed plan of how the Varsity can function as a completely independent, autonomous student newspaper with its own levy, responsible to the students and not to the student council."

Cook expects to have to fight out the issue at SAC: "There will be a lot of people on council opposed to it. They'll make arguments about financial mismanagement and responsibility to the students and so forth, that are not completely valid. I think that student council would probably be opposed to it as a whole."

Cook would like to see more Varsity staffers involved in the administrative work, though he will not ignore it.

Retiring editor Mario Cutajar sees a continuing struggle in the newspaper between those who are concerned with conventional "professionalism" and those who would concern themselves mainly with the politics and content of the newspaper. Cook disagrees: "Everyone would like a paper that is 'professional', that is well produced, that people want to read . . . I don't think that is in any sort of conflict with a paper that is provocative and that takes a stand on various things."

No more factionalism

Cook believes that the factionalism which arose within the Varsity in early 1977 has gradually disappeared. "At the end of Eric (MacMillan's) year as editor, there was a good deal of hysteria. People were talking about the CPC-ML (Communist Party of Canada, Marxist-Leninist) but didn't really understand what that party was, or how political parties fit into a student newspaper, or how they act . . . people were really in the dark. I think that sort of attitude has largely been eliminated, because people have talked more to each other over this year, and we understand pretty well where we all stand. Even though we don't agree with each other, we're not subject to the blind prejudices and fears that were created in Eric's year. Those fears perpetuated themselves and have only gradually disappeared."

What divisions remain, Cook says, arise from honest disagreement between those who are "more and less opposed to government policies in education."

Cook doesn't expect to encounter the same internal problems as Cutajar, regarding financial and administrative management of the Varsity. "If Mario's emphasis was political, mine is more administrative. As far as the quality of the paper goes, I don't intend to neglect it, but I don't intend to give up writing editorials. I'm going to encourage more participation by other people."

Cook's view of the Varsity as a co-operative venture will lead him to seek more staff participation in the administration of the paper, but in the final analysis, "I think it is my responsibility to take care of administrative matters on the paper, and I accept that."

One of Cook's greatest challenges will be to overcome the factionalism which has plagued the Varsity for two years. If he succeeds in this, he will be much closer to achieving his other goals in the newspaper.

Cook says student councils should be stronger and more aggressive.

Graffiti and wanton damage to buildings and other property cost the University of Toronto $21,000 last year in repair bills. This is too high a price to pay for momentary whims of fancy or malicious mischief. This waste of money, especially during a period of financial restraint, is criminal.

T.O. punks Jammed senseless, Madcats feast on corpse

It's not often that two Varsity reviewers get carte blanche to drink at one of Toronto's classier night spots, namely the Colonial. And, indeed, we wouldn't have received such an appealing offer if that establishment had been presenting its usual jazz types. But last Tuesday it was the British conservative punks, the Jam, backed up by Toronto's own Madcats. And with the losers that such a double bill was bound to attract, they must have figured they could afford a few drinks to bring some class to the club in the form of two worldly Varsity reporters.

So as we stood in the cold, waiting to be admitted to our seats, we took stock of the audience. The Toronto punk scene is full of mindless half-wits who have taken the low-brown nature of punk as a justification and even glorification of their stupidity and overpowering dearth of talent. So, whereas one can respect a figure like Johnny Rotten for his political convictions or Johnny Ramone for his sense of humour, the punk types of the Big Cabbage are almost all uniformly poor and even dishonest reflections of intelligent punks.

And so the evening began with the Viletones' Natzee Dog threatening us in the line-up. A single negroer from Neil, however, so confused the poor red-headed thing that he forgot his evil intentions. Once inside the establishment, the punks began their infiltration by sneaking into the press section. Tacky.

Once the opening band hit the stage, things got worse. Now the Madcats are a bad bar band. They are a collection of five mediocre musicians who would be better off working as taxi drivers. Their brand of Aerosmith-Argent-bookie-beer-drinking-red-neck rock is diametrically opposed to what the punks stand for. It came as no surprise, then, that beer bottles began to fill the air and various witty types tried to knock over the band's amplifiers and unplug their monitors.

What was a surprise was the way in which the band dealt with the situation. They knew better than to take the Toronto punks seriously and so kept on playing. Meanwhile Natzee Dog threatened to jump off the balcony onto the stage, a fall of about twenty-five feet. This was only after he had been running around looking for the short fat man with the cigar who he felt would give him a multi-year contract. No luck there, so he began to demand conditions for his death-defying jump; first, that he should be mentioned in the Globe and Mail by Paul McGrath, and second, that someone should pay him.

Eventually the Dog realised the no one really cared if he jumped or not. Thus he went around bothering bouncers until he found one who would prevent him from jumping. And this is the guy who promised to kill himself on stage before the year is out? The man is a complete asshole.

So here's the paradox. No matter how bad the Madcats were, they still came across as more honest than the Toronto punks. Those bimbos, whether they know it or not, are actively prostituting what is supposed to be an anti-establishment movement. And they won't even admit it. Undoubtedly this is because the bulk of them are too stupid to come to grasp with the concepts they are supposedly advocating. Whatever the case, one thing should be apparent, Toronto punks have no class.

Anyway after the Madcats' interminable set, the club settled down and quietly awaited the arrival of the Jam. The English three man band is one of the top five New Wave groups that have emerged from across the waters; these days the Sex Pistols, the Clash, the Damned, the Stranglers, and the Jam are the heavyweights of the English punk division.

The threesome soon bounded on stage wearing clean-cut black suits, white shirts, and pointed shoes. None of them vomited or snarled or bit a roadie. They just plugged in their instruments and started playing.

The leader of the band is guitarist Paul Weller. He's responsible for most of the material and the majority of vocals. Next in the hierarchy is bass player Bruce Foxton, who is quite possibly the cleanest looking musician since Davy Jones starred with the Monkees. The third member is the drummer who modestly sat behind his drumkit and beat the hell out of it throughout the evening.

Together the threesome sound like an English version of the Ramones. They play their music with great proficiency and with amazing speed. Weller has been compared to Peter Townshend and rightly so. He specializes in the same sort of chunky riffs and leaps around the stage in similar fashion.

Lyricaly the band are ultra-conservative. "Standards" is a song about what they think of standards in the U.K., and they seem quite happy with tradition. Union Jacks were draped over the amplifiers as they churned out one song after another.

Their set drew on songs from both their albums, In The City and This Is The Modern World. A typical Jam song starts at a suicidally fast tempo and revolves around a refrain which is repeated and repeated. Nothing too original but admittedly they're very good at it. Perspiration dripped down Weller's face as he and Foxton cavorted around the stage. Visually it was one of the more exciting punk acts — exciting in the same way that a Who concert used to be; no flash-pots, simply a lot of energy.

For once the encore surpassed the show itself. The Jam returned to perform two non-originals, "Slow Down" and "The Midnight Hour". People danced around the stage while others simply nodded in appreciation. The Toronto punks were noticeably quiet, as they were witnessing the kind of professional show that their bands could never reproduce.

It was an exciting evening in which three young English musicians recreated the kind of excitement that was reminiscent of the early sixties. In three years time, the Jam may be the only one of the top five English New Wave bands who are still around. And rightly so.

Triumph; guess who lacks moxy?

So Perky Paul and Nifty Neil think that they had lotsa larrifs at the Madcats-Jam show (see above). Quit the spoof, goof! That same night I was at Maple Leaf Dungeon savouring the gentle caress of errant frisbees against my head; revelling in the numerous cigarette butts, firecrackers and miscellaneous pieces of highway fare dropped on my crotch; having my corneas welded together by stage flashpots; and drooling over more jail-bait than I should see in a whole year. Real keen Dean.

The Guess Who took the stage and were told to give it back minutes later. This wheezy ensemble, (de-)composed of former group members and lacquered buffalo-chips proved to be a pale imitation of the original Guess Who, which was always a pale imitation of a rock group anyway. Songs like "Share the Land" which spun homey tales of "wheat chaff up your nose, tar-sands on your clothes" sent the crowd into feeding frenzy, and prompted one youthful errant to commandeer a Massey-Ferguson 1600 tractor over the "Shades of Burton Cummings" lead singer's windpipe. A good time was had by all.

We were then treated to the incompa-rabble Moxie (a young Toronto breakthrough band of the seventies doomed to stay on Permanent Hold forever), who dropped by after their Sadie Hawkins Day Dance gig at Parkdale Collegiate to entertain the crowd. The kids lapped up the group's sonic flatulence come tuneless heavy metal like it was free-sample qualudes. However in the real world, ennui once more grappled passive disinterest in a free form stomping match.

Then came the Big Moment (you could tell it was because the lights went out): Time for Triumph, Toronto's candidate for the Legend in Their Own Mind Sweepstakes. They like to think of their music as a fusion of progressive rock and heavy metal, and it is precisely this bastardization of the latter which sends me into paroxysms of near-loathing.

And as for Rik Emmett, the star of the group and the so-called "Rock and Roll Machine" referred to in their second album of the same name, all one can say is that he's technically perfect but is as antiseptic and heartless as a steel girder. At least KISS' Ace Frehley looks stupid and has the decency to fall down now and again during his solos.

But look guys, just for having such a KISS-rivalling pyrotechnical arsenal and toting it around without wearing oven mitts, I'll put a little star in your notebooks. Besides, who cares what I think anyway? The kids loved it and that's what counts. And with boys 'n' girls like this populating our town, there's a gold mine in lobbytomy fees and concert promoting for anyone who wants to just go out there and grab the old brass ring. I hear next time around Lynyrd Skynyrd's going to fly in, be stuffed and nailed to the stage and their Best Of album will be played, with tickets going at ten bucks a throw . . .

Flowers blossom

Lindsay Kemp's zany pantomime Flowers is featured from March 24th to April 16th at the Toronto Workshop Productions Theatre. The show is dedicated to Jean Genet, and if that isn't warning enough, then prepare yourself for two spellbinding hours of shock, passion, homosexuality, eroticism and ambiguous religious ardour.

The flamboyant Lindsay Kemp's claim to fame is not merely that he's one of David Bowie's erstwhile mentors during the Ziggy Stardust days, nor the rumour that he's also a descendant of Will Kemp, Shakespeare's famous clown. Kemp himself just happens to be an impressive dancer, a brilliant mime artist and an enthralling entertainer.

Kemp may be getting on in years, but you'd never guess by regarding his fluid body. And that's what his extravagant production Flowers is all about. Never mind trying to figure out the enigmatic plot. Just concentrate on the floating movements of Kemp and his troupe of mime dancers, who impressionistically pulsate, gyrate, fornicate and even masturbate throughout an intriguingly carnal yet mystical performance.

Kemp's artistic judgment as the star and director of Flowers is unerring. Surprisingly, the show isn't offensive in the slightest. A pervasive ambience of decadence, emphasized by the moody tunes ranging from classical to blues and French emotive, by the heady perfume of musty flowers and incense, and by the ethereally sordid stage props, envelops the audience into a netherworld of fantasy.

In addition to all of this, the lighting during the performance alone is worth the price of admission. The bones, the flesh, and the scant, rippling apparel of the characters fluctuate between harshness and luminosity according to the skillful use of multi-coloured spotlights. The outrageously made-up faces glitter, the tacky costumes gleam, and shimmering flower petals drip voluptuously onto the stage continuously. The final scene is effectively jarring as Kemp's lonely, blood-spattered visage hovers phosphorescently amidst a pool of blackness.

The nine members of the cast are all luridly haunting in their roles, particularly Kemp as the passionate madame Divine. Kemp's associate director and co-star David Haughton plays a memorable archangel Gabriel, while The Incredible Orlando as Mimosa is just plain astounding, especially since he's been blind for about ten years. As Orlando proves, the mimes themselves are "athletes of the senses", relying instead upon instinct and emotion.

Easter seems a curiously appropriate time to behold Kemp's spectacle, although the touring show is obviously adaptable to various occasions and locations. Kemp comments: "What I want to do with theatre is to restore the glamour of the Folies Bergere, the thrill of the circus, and the danger of rock 'n' roll. I really want to take the audience's breath away." Considering the number of jolts you experience in his electric pantomime Flowers, Kemp is well on the way to achieving his lofty aim.

Think twice, it's all trite

Cabaret should signal a very exciting evening in entertainment: the tension of more serious theatre-going is absent; dialogues between actors and audience should promote an informal atmosphere, but often this is sadly not the case. Last week at Harbourfront Think Twice, It's All Right seriously damaged the spirit of cabaret in Toronto.

The show was more of a nightclub act built around a woman's view of life, love and Bob Dylan. Charmie Guettel wrote most of the material and was the solo performer in the show. A great deal of responsibility was placed on Guettel's shoulders and she did not stand up well.

The production lacked a variety of acts, there were no contrasts in comic and dramatic moments. Guettel delivered monologues in a very static manner and offered no sense of character. Her music was unfortunately presented in much the same way. The sound system failed to convey any sense of softness or suppleness in Guettel's voice and should have been dispensed with.

The decision to call this show a cabaret was a mistake. The director, Schuster Gindin, never once tried to draw performer and spectator together with a sense of experiment in theatrical approach.

Harbourfront can supply the small intimate space necessary for more informal theatre, but Think Twice, It's All Right was staged in a large reception hall. The cafeteria was open, however the audience was extremely reserved; there were few late-comers, no interruptions, no seat changing, in short, no sense of the cabaret spirit.

From my understanding cabaret has changed a good deal since Berlin in the 20's, but last week I was not convinced the change was at all worthwhile. Gindin and Guettel's interpretation of cabaret left me very disappointed.

Paraplegics emit strange sounds at UC

A superficial observer might have considered Out Of The Ashes, staged in the UC Playhouse, a great chance for nine pretty girls to sport nice costumes in mildly erotic situations. Out Of The Ashes does not have a writer and has very few words. Whatever lines are in the play are written for the most part by the actors themselves. The play is a bit of everything: a pantomime, a musical and a drama. It is a result of a drama workshop course offered in UC and in my opinion, none of the students will fail.

In such cases, when the dictates of tradition and of the established theatrical authorities are spurned so heedlessly, the artists own all of their branchchild, lock, stock and barrel. They can take all the credit for it, or, perhaps, all the blame. This man's art and that man's scope are pitched together, and sometimes the panting of Necessity is heard so close, that the aesthetic distance is all but gone.

The play opens with paraplegic actors emitting strange sounds and spitting on the floor. A girl made a speech that had all the gesture and the movement of a speech, but was silent. That created on the stage what seemed a very real atmosphere of a communication breakdown. Actors behaved as a society whose every member assumes a stereotyped role that is self-contained, fixed and limiting. Such society, then, lacks real communication between its members. The human beings turn into masks and such life is like death because it is static.

The actress in the short dress with the ball illustrated this inability to communicate or live the best precisely because she was just a mask. Her role has not shown any development in the play. When an actor is playing a mask, the best actor is perhaps the worst actor.

The space available in the UC Playhouse was well used by the director. The lighting was designed to break up the stage into a number of separate areas. The musical pieces are well placed and well performed. At the beginning of the play, when the opening silent parts started to weigh heavily on the audience, the piano part was well timed to relieve this tension.

The roles in the play apparently had no names, so it is impossible to evaluate the actors individually. Such evaluation may appear superfluous, because for the most part the girls were playing themselves.

A Casual Affair: new stability in womanhood

A CASUAL AFFAIR: a modern fairytale, Sylvia Fraser, MacLelland and Stewart, hardcover $12.95.

Sylvia Fraser is arguably the finest novelist in English speaking Canada. Her Pandora is dynamite, by which I do mean to suggest that it explodes with terrific force in every direction at once, a novel rich in hilarity, pathos, lividity, pain, rage, grotesque fantasy and brutal documentary, which in its magic exactness obtains high colorings of the surreal. The Candy Factory continues in the same direction with, in places, even more violent intensity and starkness.

In A Casual Affair every second chapter until halfway through the book is a modern fairytale. Each is a tap into the unconscious, written by a woman to help her comprehend some aspect of herself, her lover, or their affair.

Halfway through the novel, the fairytales cease. The fairytale imagery that was previously a backdrop to the main narrative's realistic portrayal of the affair emerges and the two streams in the novel become one. The combination is brilliantly surreal. The use of fairytale imagery is too complex to begin to detail here, but a single example may help to illustrate: the man goes to visit the woman in a glass tower (a modern skyscraper), and, in an ironic reversal, she leaves the tower to slay the dragons (alcoholism, cynicism and a lifetime of bad faith in his relationships with women) which beset her man.

The only point in the novel at which I think the fairytale and the documentary strains mesh badly is in the closing passage. The princess has had her last meeting with the knight (an M.P.) at his yacht club, and on impulse she gets into one of the rowboats and begins to row herself across the lake and into the night. The trip is dangerous but she thinks it's worth attempting despite the risk. The symbolism — the night journey symbolizing her capacity to wrestle boldly with the unseen, the unforeseen, with the inky depths of her own unconscious drives seems a little too easy here, a little too superficial as well. The symbol rides on the same surface that the rowboat bobs upon in its crossing. It's not the irresolution of the ending that bothers me. Many fine works of art leave that sense at the close but they are depth-charged, dynamic irresolutions. This I don't feel in the last few paragraphs of A Casual Affair. It's not as strong an ending as the power of what has gone before would seem to demand.

With that reservation duly ticketed however, A Casual Affair is a memorable novel which reconfirms in my mind the innovative gifts of Sylvia Fraser, and the premiere significance of her work amongst Canadian novelists in English.

Martin Heavisides

On Monday, March 20, in the year of our Lord 1978, I visited Sylvia Fraser to interview her on the subject of her new novel, A Casual Affair. This is some of what followed:

I wondered at various points while I was reading A CASUAL AFFAIR to what extent the novel might be autobiographical. For two reasons. One, the physical description of the woman in the affair suggests you.

Fair enough, but the other reason I was wondering is that the way her speech and her inner monologues are set up seems to give them narrative assent. I wondered if she is your mouthpiece in the novel.

All fairytale princesses have blonde hair and blue eyes.

No, I don't think that the woman is particularly my mouthpiece... That is the weapon that she uses. Most women feel underpowered in a relationship. The things they reach for in difficult situations are words, language, tongue. And she is intellectually inclined, so she berates him with words; that is her weapon. Most of the things she says have a fair truth to them, but she often says them at the wrong time, the right thing at the wrong time and in the wrong way, so that... no, she doesn't represent the way I feel a woman should conduct herself in that kind of affair by a long shot.

But she does represent — the two of them together represent — something I feel about society today, and that is that women are probably in a lot better shape emotionally than men. Part of this is the result of the women's movement, and the kind of orgy of introspection that has gone on since then in terms of women going into themselves, taking emotional risks in terms of discovering who they are, and men have not had that kind of opportunity yet.

One of the things about this book that have pleased me so far is that there's been a feedback — men really like it, that they have responded very strongly. I thought they might be hostile because the male character is not presented in the most glowing of terms. Neither is the female, but a lot of the energy of the book is in her dissecting him in an unfavorable way. I thought men would react hostilely to that, but they seem almost grateful these things are being discussed. The male character is in many ways more to be pitied than censored. Because he has gone after success at all odds, he is a superachiever, he has put all his energy, all his caring into his professional life and he has gained many laurels. But he has done this at the risk of his emotional life. This is what we encourage men to do, we encourage them to not show weakness, we encourage them to be superachievers, but inside every Superman there's a Clark Kent fishing to come out.

Speaking of Clark Kent... there's a scene in the novel in which the man is very appealing. He is in New York with the woman and has dropped her off while he goes on to the U.N. There he's beginning to go through emotional changes, to open up to the woman, and his vulnerability and confusion are very appealing... more so than later in the book when he is beginning to sort things out and feels that he has genuinely opened up, after his six months at the sanatorium.

Well, because he has put his caring into his professional life, anything which involves his professional life is likely to make him appear in a much fuller, better way. The thing about an affair is that it isolates two people from society. That is a secret affair — people meet in secret, in faceless places. That's one reason why I don't name my characters. The chapter headings go like this: "In A Hotel Room," "In A Parked Car". That is where affairs take place, so that people are isolated from their real lives. They're isolated from their support systems, they're required to lie to their friends. Often the affair is surrounded by a great deal of guilt and hostility because they're cheating on their marriage. Both of these characters probably would be people that we would like and admire and respond to outside of the affair but the thing about an affair is that it's claustrophobic. It brings together two people's raw selves. Now if these are needy, vulnerable, loving selves that's one thing. But generally speaking, the reason it is an affair is that both people, or one or the other, are only willing to take limited risks. The thing the man is frightened of most is, not the quarrels, but when things get good. Whenever he feels emotionally attached to her, that's when he wants to run the hardest.

V.D.

Some straight talk from Julius Schmid

The purpose of this advertisement is to educate you about venereal diseases. If you think this subject is no concern of yours, we'd like to point out that V.D. has reached epidemic proportions in Canada. It cuts across all age, income, social and educational groups. A conservative estimate is that between 500,000 and 1 million Canadians suffer from V.D.

What we're going to do in this advertisement is to tell you in plain, simple language about three of the most prevalent venereal diseases in Canada today. What the symptoms are, the various stages of the diseases and most important of all, what you can do to prevent infection.

Now, if in the course of reading this advertisement, you suspect you might have some of the symptoms described, consult your physician immediately. The treatment is confidential and if caught early enough the disease can be easily treated.

GONORRHEA

This particular disease has become rampant due to possible changing social and sexual attitudes. Despite the most advanced treatment methods medical science has been unable to check the spread of this condition.

STAGE I

Symptoms generally appear from two to six days after exposure to the bacterium Neisseria gonorrhoea, however, up to 20 percent of men and as high as 80 percent of women show no symptoms at all. In the male, the usual signs are pain when urinating and a discharge of pus from the penis. Women are likely to experience burning during urination, a yellowish vaginal discharge, abnormal menstrual bleeding, and swelling or abscess of the Bartholin's glands at the mouth of the vagina. (Symptoms of oral and anal infection may include, in the throat, a burning sensation, and, in the rectum, burning and itching, persistent urge to defecate, and a bloody discharge).

STAGE II

If allowed to progress untreated, gonorrhea can produce severe inflammation of the pelvic organs; blockage of the Fallopian tubes and sperm ducts and thus sterility; gonorrheal rheumatism or arthritis; inflammation of the heart valves; even blindness, particularly in newborn babies.

Up until a few years ago, penicillin was the standard treatment method, but today, several penicillin-resistant strains of the disease have appeared and other, stronger drugs—tetracycline, spectinomycin, ampicillin, amoxicillin—must sometimes be used. Cases in which pelvic inflammatory disease has developed may also require hospitalization.

SYPHILIS

First of all let's make one thing clear: you can't pick up syphilis from lavatory seats or public drinking fountains. Syphilis is transmitted only through sexual intercourse.

STAGE I

About three weeks after sexual relations, a lesion called a chancre (pronounced "shanker") develops at the site—usually the genitals or mouth—and nearby lymph nodes become enlarged. The chancre itself disappears within four to six weeks.

STAGE II

If syphilis is left untreated, more lymph nodes eventually become enlarged and a spotty red rash appears over most of the body. During this stage, fever, weight loss, general weakness, loss of appetite and headaches are typical. After several months, the rash subsides and syphilis enters a latent period lasting months or even years.

STAGE III

Blindness, insanity, impotence, heart disease.

Children born to syphilitic mothers are also infected. The earliest sign is sniffing, after which sores appear on the skin and the mucous membranes, and the disease starts to progress as in adults.

If caught early enough, syphilis can be easily treated with penicillin. Other antibiotics such as tetracycline, erythromycin, or chloramphenicol are also used.

GENITAL HERPES

This sexually transmitted disease was almost unknown until the late sixties. About 95 percent of all cases are due to infection with herpes simplex virus II, a virus affecting only the genital areas; while another 5 percent result from infection of the genital area with herpes simplex I, the cold-sore virus.

STAGE I

In women, tiny, painful blisters resembling oral cold sores appear on the labia, cervix or anus. Symptoms in men include similar lesions on the penis or anus, accompanied by burning urination and watery penile discharge. Fever is a possibility in both sexes. Within a day or so the blisters break, then form round, grey-white patches which generally heal spontaneously within two weeks. This may be the end of the problem, or genital herpes may reappear periodically as cold sores often do.

STAGE II

A possible serious complication: recent studies suggest that herpes II may play a role in the development of cervical cancer. The virus is reported to be present in 36 percent of cervical cancer patients, and parts of the herpes II virus have been extracted from cervical cancer cells. Because of this, women who've been infected should be especially careful to have regular Pap tests.

No totally effective cure for herpes exists. While some gynecologists paint the infected area with gentian violet, others maintain this treatment doesn't work. However, a promising new antihistamine drug, adenine arabinoside (Ara-A) is being tested and may soon be approved for general use.

AND HOW TO PREVENT CONTRACTING THEM.

There are only two methods of avoiding the risk of contracting V.D.

1. Refrain from sexual relations.
2. Use a prophylactic during intercourse.

Use of the prophylactic is the only method officially recognized and accepted as an aid in the prevention of transmission of venereal disease. Besides being a disease preventative, prophylactics are one of the oldest and more effective means of birth control known and the most popular form used by males.

And we'd like to introduce you to six of the best brands of prophylactics that money can buy. They're all made by Julius Schmid. They're all electronically tested to assure quality and dependability. And you can only buy them in drug stores.

The politics of radical masectomy

SEIZING OUR BODIES, ed. Claudia Dreifuss, Vintage Books, paperback $5.95.

Seizing Our Bodies is a very good information manual on problems of women's health. There are essays on breast cancer, the pill and its various effects, childbirth, abortion, hysterectomies, etc. The writing is highly charged and politically engaging, as it demands to be. To talk about the simple facts of women's health from any point of view, is to make a political statement because every decision made in the medical treatment of women is related to an implicit societal attitude.

Why is there no male pill? Why do many medical authorities, in treating breast cancer, still insist on radical mastectomy as the treatment of choice? Why is hysterectomy routinely suggested as a method of birth control to women in their mid-to-late thirties? Indeed, why is medical science so eager to "cut" as a matter of course in the treatment of women, as if their flesh were endlessly dispensable? (We don't touch here on the eagerness in general of the surgical profession to cut, which affects men as well. It affects women more, however, because we still haven't come to a pass where a man consulting his family physician about birth control is normally advised to have a vasectomy.)

Because all of these questions necessarily involve a political attitude and a political response, writings like these, mainly intended to transmit information, invariably transmit attitude as well. In fact it is the intention of the writer to do both.

The writing in Seizing Our Bodies is impassioned, intelligent, with a few exceptions always competent and with no exceptions never splendid. Because of this the book is good propaganda, good journalism, and an excellent vehicle for the transmission of its information. On all these counts the book is first-rate, and it can't be faulted for not being something it didn't set out to be: art. But because it is not that, it is limited in its usefulness; propaganda can reinforce the attitude of somebody who already agrees with the propagandist, it can sway somebody who is waffling and undecided. But only art can open up dialogue with those who actively disagree with one's own framework and bias. Only art can change the mind and expand the heart of another human being.

The book is flawed on its own terms as well. It is not always fair. Like any journalistic anthology from any political viewpoint written by people who have questioned their own views too little, there is a self-righteous attitude in the prose that leads to irritating distortions. Adrienne Rich, for one example, in "The Theft of Childbirth" mentions the nineteenth century Victorian idea that intellectual women were deflecting blood from their generative organs and putting themselves out of touch with "the deepest laws of the cosmos" and adds: "This was a view later shared by D. H. Lawrence and Hitler."

That's a quarter-truth that slides down the gullet of the reader as easily as an oyster but that ease of passage makes it no more true. The truth is that among the many embattled ideas that Lawrence lived with in his short, often wrongheaded, but always heroic life was this idea, but not in anything like the simple form in which it was held by the Victorian physician. The truth is that he didn't trust intellect much in either men or women, and in a longer piece I would be willing to argue the point that he was in some considerable measure right.

Hitler did include among his carefully-worn repertoire of handy demagogical ideas a version of this idea yet more barbaric, simplistic, perverted than the Victorian physicians. But in absolutely no sense was Lawrence's complicated, endlessly rethought and refelt view of the intelligence of women shared by Hitler in his lunar psychopathic ravings.

There are other examples of that kind of critical displacement of nuance, such as the title "Institutionalized Male-Practice" over one section of the book. And it is not the cause of women's liberation or human liberation that is served by that kind of bending and twisting, as much as the cause of yellow journalism.

Mercifully, however, that sort of thing doesn't happen often in the book, and it is for the most part a worthy anthology. I particularly recommend "What Medical Students Learn About Women", "The Class Factor: Mountain Women Speak Out On Women's Health", and "Sexual Surgery In Late Nineteenth-Century America."

Smith's reborn on Easter

Patti Smith's rock and roll career on vinyl starts with Easter, her newest album. I was disappointed after my first listening; at that point, I was comparing it to Horses, her first album. But Easter grew into a nice surprise.

Horses is an excellent album, it broke a lot of new ground. However, lyrically and musically speaking, there's a lot more poetry on it than rock and roll. It is a nervously vibrant album; being inexperienced in a rock and roll studio, it sort of popped out like a burp before she could do anything about it.

Even Patti was stunned by it. She played cool to the press, saying it was O.K. for a first album, but it could have had better production. So what we got with Radio Ethiopia (her second) was Horses redone with Aerosmith in mind. John Cale's paper thin production gave Horses half its strength. However, Jack Douglas's heavy metal job only helped push Radio Ethiopia down the trail to compromise and confusion.

These two albums are directly comparable, and the comparison is the most pronounced during the climaxes of both. Horses ends with "Land and Elegie", and Radio Ethiopia ends with the title track and "Abyssinia". Each are 12 minutes long and for fans only.

During her injury - prolonged lay-off prior to the release of Easter, Patti figured out two things. One, she does not need to have an opus on each album. Easter's title track is once again both the last and longest song on the album, but it is two minutes longer than anything else only because it's that much slower. Two, rock'n'roll and poetry are compatible, but Jack Douglas isn't the man to pull it off. Any poetry on Radio Ethiopia sounds contrived. The production is unsympathetic and Patti sounds like she knows it.

So on Easter we've got production by Jimmy Iovine that leaves plenty of room for poetry while at the same time being as much a boost in power over Radio Ethiopia as R.E. was over Horses.

The most important part of Easter is its relationship to Patti's first two albums. It manages to re-capture the religious power that Horses has in a different, more confident way. I was afraid that she would never burp again.

Andrew Meyers

Patti Smith's latest release Easter offers less talking and more singing than her previous works. Her vocal style is more settled here. There is token static confusion to please the anarchy fans of Radio Ethiopia and enough double track talk to cater to the basic needs of Horses fans. On Easter there's a track titled "25th Floor" which definitively proves that the two Smiths are better than one. Easter is her finest product to date.

Easter is fundamentally an album dealing with Smith's view of religion. One cut named "Babelogue" is nothing but a repetitive mystical garble that is as abstruse as it is useless. It has no redeeming features whatsoever. If Smith decides to pursue this theme in future albums, she will chant her way into obscurity. I hope Smith will realize that rock'n'roll and religion are a dangerous mixture.

The most exciting number is "Rock'n'Roll Nigger" — a wild, climactic song that should only be heard at a painfully loud volume. Typical of Patti Smith the poet, it is preceded by a crude spacy monologue. The rhythms are basic, the sound fantastic, and the band tight. Here it becomes abundantly clear that Smith is the nigger, the oppressed and struggling artist. She declares that Jesus Christ, Jimi Hendrix, and Jackson Pollock were all niggers like herself, because they tried to "extend beyond the classical form".

The accompanying liner notes contain photos and a poem beside each song. It is versatile poetry that doesn't feel the need for conventional forms and standards, poetry that doesn't lie stagnant in a text. Patti Smith's imagery has much to offer, but sadly confuses minds that have been given a steady diet of standard simplistic rock lyrics.

Five or six years ago "an amazing spun out chick" used to give poetry recitals in Times Square. The success of a third album has not made the poetry any worse.

theatre

Well the big Easter bunny has come and gone. Yes that's right John Wilson has abandoned The Varsity for Ottawa.

But let's get down to the nitty-gritty, as we interim theatre editors say. Toronto Workshop is presenting Flowers by the Lindsay Kemp Company at 12 Alexander St. Having seen a preview, I recommend it most highly. It's a show that is difficult to summarize, but visually it's stunning. See today's review. Tickets are $5, call 925-8640 for details.

Moliere's Scapin closes out the season for Toronto Arts Productions at the St. Lawrence Centre. It opens tonight and details may be obtained by calling 366-1656.

Thursday starts off a six-day run of A Day In The Death Of Joe Egg by the East Side Players. This outfit was always highly rated by John, so what can I say? Catch them at Old Todmorden Paper Mill (that's the real address) or call 423-5704.

Opening April 4, James Reaney's Wacousta can be seen at the Bathurst Street Theatre. The Peterborough Common Press gave it a rave review, so there you go. Call 536-9255 for all the info.

Continuing shows: Brides Of Dracula at Toronto Free Theatre. Call 368-2856. Sexual Pervency In Chicago is still playing at the New Theatre. Call 534-1101 and you'll never sleep again. At the Road Show Theatre try to catch One Night Stand. The C.B.C. production was excellent, but I've received no word either way on this version.

At the Phoenix there's always Loos by Joe Orton. As you may remember Orton was the promising young English playwright who was bludgeoned to death with a hammer by his irate lover. Pity. Anyway, call 922-7835 for info.

Le Theatre Du P'tit Bonheur presents Quatre A Quatre de Michel Garneau jusqu'à l'avril 2. Telephone 363-4129 pour le low-down. Bon bon. Children Of Night continues at Bathurst St. Theatre.

Coming soon, The Fabulous Bachelors at the O'Keefe. Don't miss it. That's it from Neil here. Best wishes to John Wilson wherever you are.

A Prairie Dog Show by Alexandra Haeseker arrived in Toronto with its canine models this week and is begging for attention at the Mira Godard Gallery. Viewers are asked to reveal the dog beneath their own skins. Till April 11. Painting under a similar name, Dieter Hastenteufel opens a show of sculptures and prints in the Hart House Gallery and Quadrangle on Tuesday, till April 21. And to complete the vertical mosaic, Gershon Iskowitz's paintings at the Gallery Moos and William Kurelek's show at the Isaacs Gallery play out the battle between abstract and representative art. Till April 6 and 1.

Picasso works are at the Albert White Gallery on Saturday, replacing the John Ridgewell paintings (closing today) whose experiments in cloning pastoral landscapes to pine writing desks put him in the American scientific community's bad books.

Photogenics features are at the David Mirvish Gallery and the Photo Books Gallery. The latter is an exhibition of Cibachrome prints by hungry OCA students, the former a show called Portraits of the Photographers by Arnold H. Crane. They're both beat by the Edward Maybridge photographs at the AGO. His late 19th century studies of human and animal locomotion are very sophisticated for the time. Till April 2.

The AGO has a strong set of shows closing after this weekend including The Inuit Print, Bo'ju Neejeel and Recent Acquisitions. However their theme show on Heroes and Heroines from the 17th century to the 20th is a must for all English students now floundering amid Shakespeare essays and 18th century novels.

The Picasso show at the Albert White Gallery is nicely offset by the Ang Klukok show at the new Piew's Gallery nearby on Avenue Road. Klukok borrows heavily from Picasso but adds the perspective of Asian emotive art. Till May 1.

In which the Toronto art scene suffers movable feastian stigmata.

Tonight: OISE is in a continental mood and strolls the boulevards with French Provincial and a trio of early shorts Paris Qui Dort (by Rene Clair), Menilmontant (Kirsanov) and Ballet Mechanique (Fernand Leger). Meanwhile the Revue is strutting up a storm all on its own back in North America with Astaire and Rogers in Shall We Dance and Carefree. And the Science Centre has a pair by Ernst Lubisch Kohlhaeisel's Daughter and The Wild Cat with Lumiere showing 1900 until God know's when.

Thursday: Things get a little thin at this time of year. Cinema Lumiere is still showing films in dankest obscurity. And New Yorker is just finishing up the funeral arrangements for the Grateful Dead. The Science Centre is still stuck in Central Europe and appeals to the kiddies with the promise of Little White Lies a film from Bulgaria. And, moving further east OISE has the India Herman Hesse never saw with Satyajit Ray's Two Daughters and Strabaddha.

Friday: The New Yorker is closed for interment of the special sound system. The U of T Film Society is busy playing the Thing That Wouldn't Die. The Canadian Armed Forces have tried everything, bombs, gas, mutated plague bacillae, black ju-jubes, but nothing will stop them from showing bad films at outrageous prices. This week D. H. (Dan) and the boys have a pair of death rays in Catch 22 and Harold and Maude (which has an endless run in the Minneapolis of the heart). The Revue is still kicking up its heels with Swingtime and Top Hat. Will they ever stop? Let's hope not.

Saturday: The New Yorker rises again to enter, one way or another and probably all of them. The Realm of the Senses.

Sunday: Innis is proudly presenting to the 4 1/2 people in Toronto who haven't seen it yet, The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari, with those famous film textbook sets... But on the same bill it has Keaton's Batting Butler a film about Jeeves the pugilist. And in the afternoon they have the usual programme of cartoons. Meanwhile over on the Strip the New Yorker has Pasolini's Salo (don't ask me how they got a print) which is based on the 45th, 57th, and 71st of De Sade's 120 Days of Sodom. On the same bill is a film called Vigil which is a faithful retelling of the Adam and Eve story. Monday: The New Yorker is courting high blood pressure this week and has, somehow, landed a double preview of De Laurentis' living proof of the truths of Hegelian synthesis Drumming (which might be a comedy but probably isn't) and Francis Ford Coppola's Apocalypse Now.

Tuesday: To end the week the Science Centre has dog-sledded in a classic of Finnish cinema called Antti Puhhaara. The real action however, is, as usual this week, at the New Yorker which has two immortal horror flyx Night of the Creeping Horror and Night Walker.

Tomorrow at 1:30 the Women's Musical Club finishes its season with Bulgarian violinist Stolka Milanova. Students $2 at St. Andrew's Presbyterian (King and Simcoe).

The Guameri is still my idea of the greatest string quartet in the world. They play Schubert's E flat and Beethoven's Op. 131 tomorrow evening at the St. Lawrence. Some rush at 8:00.

Two front-ranking performers regrettably clash Sunday at 8:30. In the EJB, Rosalyn Turek who is really the only Bach pianist touring N. America (on records she competes with Gould and Richter), plays the Goldberg Variations. In Massey Hall, cellist Pierre Fournier plays a program including Schubert, Debussy, and the Brahms F major. Fournier also appears in the St. Lawrence Monday evening with three Bach suites (tickets will be rare for that one).

The TS next week features Vaclav Neumann and violinist Ida Haendel with Beethoven's Fourth and Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole. Tuesday, Wednesday, and Friday, rush at 7:00. Monday at noon and Tuesday at 7:00, you can hear Prof. Morawetz's Memorial to Martin Luther King on CBC-FM and CJRT respectively.

Performances of The Marriage of Figaro begin Monday at the Royal Alex. Prices are lower at the top end and higher at the bottom compared to the O'Keefe. The sound promises to be much superior.

jazz

Hello Jazz Fans! A couple of concerts scheduled for next week are sneaking into this week's column so you can buy your advance seats. For a perfect study break, on Saturday April 8, the St. Lawrence Centre Town Hall will present the free jazz of Don Cherry. Primarily a trumpeter, he'll perform with percussionist Collin Walcott. Free jazz liberates the musicians from all preconceived structures, permitting much more dynamic interaction between them. Cherry was one of the originators of the idiom, along with Ornette Coleman, and has played with such greats as Rollins and Coltrane in the course of his eclectic career. The concerts start at 4:00 and 8:15 p.m. Tickets $7.70 and $8.80 or $5.50 for students' with cards. All seats reserved. 366-7723, 27 Front St.

Also next week, on Friday I believe, Woody Herman's Thundering Herd will perform at the Seneca College Minkler Auditorium to end off the Canadian Stage Band Festival. For info call 491-8877.

Toronto has a reputation, in jazz circles, as a hick be-bop town hostile to avant-garde jazz. Consequently it's a pleasure to see the Carla Bley Big Band appear at the Horseshoe Tavern tonight through Friday. Featured among others are Gary Windo, whoever he is, and trombonist Roswell Rudd, who is superb. Next weekend: the Cecil Taylor Unit.

Free Concert: The U of T Jazz Ensemble, led by clarinetist Phil Nimmons, swings tonight in the Hart House Music Room. Fans tell me that the band has learned how to swing.

Yellowfingers continues its first week of rebirth with the Eugene Amaro Quintet (sax & flute), a sure draw. Next week, Sonny Greenwich (guitar) will be featured along with Don Thompson on keyboards. Readers of this column will recall his recent concert at the Colonial and my brilliant and succinct encapsulation of his style. Drop in to the club to check him out. 1280 Bay at Yorkville, 967-9337.

Altoist Lee Konitz entertains at Bourbon St. until April 8 with his cool, intellectual improvisations. At George's, Moe Koffman Quintet this week followed by the inspiring flute work of the Kathryn Moses Quartet.

The Del Dako Quintet performs after hours at Cafe Soho this weekend. Del is an alto saxophonist who has gone far since graduating from York in jazz performance a few years ago. Ask for Autumn Leaves with impatience. (Every graduate of the York jazz program has played that tune weekly for four years). Sunday afternoon presents the Pete Mosely Quartet featuring guitarist Dan Larsen.

Catch the Ginny Grant Quintet at Hart House today. Next week brings back the Carleton Vaughan Quartet.

At Harbordfront, Jim Abercrombie's Vintage Jazz Band does its Dixie music this Sunday.

Dirty Zevon; rock's new Enforcer

Dear Mom:

Well Mom, it's been a long hard term. Not only did I have fourteen essays to do, I also broke up with my girl. Not to worry though Mom, I recently bought an album which really lifted my spirits. It's called Excitable Boy and it's done by that guy named Warren Zevon. He looks just like that funny kid who used to live up the road from us.

Anyway Mom, you know how I'm always complaining about the dull state-of-the-art in rock'n'roll — teenage wasteland and all that — well this Zevon character has actually written thirty minutes of interesting and enjoyable music, both instrumentally and intellectually.

Zevon penned all the songs, sings the lead vocals and plays the piano. Everything else is handled by that clique of L.A. based session musicians; you know the bunch behind Linda Ronstadt and Jackson Browne.

Mom, after all the words I've wasted in essays this year, it's refreshing to listen to a guy who can say it all in four lines. Zevon got all the action and violence of William Faulkner and you can actually understand what's happening. Some writer in Rolling Stone stated that the album was "Warren Zevon's Magnum Force", so I can't use that analogy Mom, but I know how you like Clint Eastwood so I'll say "Dirty Warren, Rock'n'Roll's New Enforcer".

The production quality on this album is really good. The instruments are evenly mixed with Zevon's piano at the front of the sound. Although his voice sounds a little thin at times, you've got to admire the way he spits out his lines.

Zevon creates characters in each of his songs and most of them are more unusual than Dickens' creations. Zevon writes about psychopaths, werewolves, mercenaries, Mexicans, and other assorted gooks and crooks. The guy has a bizarre imagination and an ear for a catchy tune. For once, Mom, I enjoyed every track on an album.

Well Mom, I have to go now. Let me tell you, Warren Zevon and Excitable Boy have really provided inspiration. By the way, how is Dad? How much time left on his sentence? There's a great line from Zevon's song "Lawyers, Guns and Money" that I want you to tell him:

Now I'm hiding in Honduras
I'm a desperate man
Send lawyers, guns and money
The shit has hit the fan.

Sound familiar? Anyway, I'll write again soon.

Sun Ra: tribal glitter jazz-rock

Last Friday, the "Horseshoe continued its policy of providing something off the beaten track with Sun Ra and his Sound Sculpture. Together they become an eleven-piece band in glittering ponchos playing very wild jungle music.

Sun Ra himself came on later and so his band did their own set. The versatile musicians were constantly changing instruments, ranging from three types of saxophones to tribal drums. Together they combined to play free-form numbers as each member worked on their own improvisational solos.

Sun Ra's entrance was blatantly theatrical, announced by two girls wearing brilliant costumes chanting "the Sun is coming". Sun started off with a frenzied electric piano solo produced by running his forearm up and down the keyboard while turning around in circles. Unfortunately his dominance often caused the other musicians some trouble in their own solos.

Intermittently the songs were augmented by a female vocalist who had a husky, full voice. The first set included songs by Duke Ellington, Jelly Roll Morton and Fletcher Henderson, but ended as the whole ensemble, less the two drummers, paraded into the audience singing, "We travel the spaceway-From planet to planet".

The second set was similar to the first, although there was a greater emphasis on costumes, chanting and soloing.

Still ignoring the glitter, Sun Ra and Sound Sculpture are playing music that few others are attempting to do. The Sun mixes his blues and Dixieland jazz with the tribal influences of Sound Sculpture. Between both ends of the spectrum, one can detect strains of Eric Dolphy and Sonny Rollins. An exhausting but energetic combination.

If you like dots, Gershon Iskowitz's show at the Gallery Moos is for you. His cheerful compositions of dancing dots are a break from the prosaic black and white of typewriters and essays.

Most of the paintings begin with a neutral ground on which two large areas of colour approach but never meet. Scattered over them are dots of vibrant hues. Often they are red on red ground or blue on blue and are not obvious at first glance. They emerge slowly so that you can't be sure if they really exist or if they are merely one of those optical illusions they tell you about in colour theory. Actually if you look at much of the show for long, dots begin to appear everywhere you look.

The colours are vivid and luminous and prompted one New York critic to think that they were the result of Canada's magnificent light. He was flummoxed when Iskowitz pointed out that he paints at night under bare light bulbs.

Included in the show are a number of small watercolours. They are a marked contrast to the sharply defined patches of colour seen in the larger oils. The soft tones flow into each other creating fuzzy shapes not unlike extended Roschach tests.

Iskowitz's dots are a delightful respite from dreary work and dreadful weather. Just don't stay too long or your eyes will never be the same.

On your way back to the Robarts drop in at the Morris Gallery's sale. Works range from $50 up to the thousands. If you can't or won't buy you can dream.

Wrestling Coach Resigns From Frustration

By HUGH STUART

Despite the recent resurgence of the sport of wrestling at U of T, the dominant image of the sport still remains one of Lord Athol Layton putting a half nelson on the Sheik as they fight 'to the death' while shackled to each other. Joe Rabel has been wrestling coach at this university for six years. Out of frustration for the lack of understanding of his sport he has resigned from his coaching position.

Rabel came to Toronto in 1972 after earning his Master's degree in Physical Education at the University of Alberta. Upon his arrival, eight wrestlers were involved in the Varsity wrestling program. Now there are thirty-two participants who practice at least three times a week and have had a wrestling tournament every weekend since November.

Rabel was quite pleased with the team's performance this year. The Blues placed an impressive third in the OUAA's and the season had a number of individual highlights. Erik Boss took two silver medals at the Canadian Junior National tournament and was thought highly enough of, to be sent to the Junior Pan American Games in Caracas, Venezuela and Jack Probrzenski gave this university its first OUAA individual championship since 1967.

Why then has Rabel resigned? A major factor lies in the poor quality of the wrestling facilities. Rabel feels that the Hart House training area is too small, that the facilities are unhygienic, and that the noise level is intolerable for effective coaching.

But those only played a small part in his decision. The major problem lies in the attitude of the U of T administration towards the wrestling team. For example a piece of equipment that a wrestling club must have is a competitive mat. In order to hold the tournaments that the university is obligated to in order to fulfill its obligations to its association, it needs a competitive mat. Rabel went 'upstairs' to obtain the funds but says that he was told that he couldn't have one because there was no place to store it. Rabel sees this as being in line with the we get so little? Once I took my team on a trip with the hockey team. The treatment that the hockey team got opened my team's eyes to a lot of things," explained Rabel.

Before the wrong impression is created, Rabel is not bitter. He's simply frustrated. By resigning, he is not (at it might appear) 'copping out'. He is going to devote his full attention to his position of executive general second-rate treatment of the less popular sports.

There are certain discrepancies between the resources made available to a team such as the Varsity Blues hockey team and the wrestling team; a team that can boast of a number of international calibre athletes. "How do I explain to my team why the Blues should receive a free pair of skates while director of the Ontario Amateur Wrestling Federation. From that position he hopes to further promote the sport. "Wrestling has been a component sport of societies throughout history, and despite popular opinion is not just limited to the athletic elite. In this order, the attributes that the wrestler must have are: speed, agility, and strength," explained Rabel.

Rabel feels that the sport of wrestling has a great future and that universities can play the role of leader in its development, but until the administration places a greater emphasis on such development, the sport may never reach its full potential.

Can you imagine the U of T without an intercollegiate football or hockey team?

Together they represent 188 years of athletic tradition at this university. They are also largely responsible for the existence of the intramural program at U of T because without them, there probably would not have been enough money to start the intramural program 36 years ago.

The elimination of hockey and football is one alternative facing the department of athletics in light of the recent decision by Internal Affairs to disallow the two dollar athletic fee increase which was requested.

At present there is just not enough money to fund all the existing programs. Something will have to go.

While it is unlikely that hockey or football will be chopped, it is almost definite that other programs will be eliminated.

Among the areas most likely to be cut are the instruction program which presently serves thousands of students; the fitness section which offers opportunities for otherwise inactive people to become fit; the sports therapy and surgery services which operate out of Hart House and provide emergency care for injured athletes; or, the promotion and advertising program which, if eliminated, would only result in further losses and cuts.

The problem stems from the fact that the department of athletics was forced to implement a five percent across-the-board budget cut as well as shouldering additional expenses in the form of Hart House surgery (which was paid by the university in the past) and additional costs for Stadium and Arena maintenance. On top of all this, decreasing enrollment has caused a further decline in revenue.

In total, the department has been the recipient of a 10.5 percent decrease. In dollar terms, they have lost about $92,000.

By rejecting the request for the two dollar increase, Internal Affairs is pretending to act in the best interest of the students. But it makes you wonder if they are really clued in to what is best for students.

The elimination of a program such as that offered by the Instruction department is certainly not going to be in the best interest of students. At present, thousands of students take part in the sporting and recreational activities offered. If they were forced to take similar courses outside the university, it would cost them hundreds of dollars.

The same can be said for the fitness department.

What's two bucks anyway when you're talking about the type of services available? At present U of T has one of the lowest athletic fees in the province but it offers intramural, and recreational programs that are second to none. For similar services at Carleton, a student is asked to pay $50. Even with the increase, St. George students will only be paying $27.

Also, if Internal Affairs is so concerned about saving students a buck, why did they let Hart House and Erindale increase their fees? It's obvious that these two needed extra money to maintain their programs. It also seems obvious that the St. George campus is entitled to the same right to preserve their programs. Or should I say obvious to everyone except perhaps our fearless leaders up at Internal Affairs.

I for one, am kind of proud to see that the U of T has an intramural program which is the envy of universities throughout North America. Our hockey program alone has 96 teams and about 1500 participants. I wonder though if any of the people who voted against the fee increase even knew this; or knew that the U of T has 17 different intramural sports for men and numerous others for women that encourage participation from approximately 5,000 students.

This isn't even counting the instruction and fitness programs already mentioned. Or the intercollegiate program which solicits involvement from thousands more students who either participate or spectate.

All these programs are in jeopardy however because seven people who probably know very little about them, have decided that it is not in the best interests of students to ask them to pay an extra two dollars to maintain them.

If the department of athletics has not finalized plans for an appeal, they should do so soon. In the meantime any student who does not like the way Internal Affairs is dooming our programs should get out his pen and paper and let his feelings be known.

Wrestlers may no longer benefit from Rabel's coaching.

Interfac Season Almost Over

There has been a lot of action in the intramural and interfac leagues since the Varsity last hit the streets a week ago. Champions have been declared in hockey, basketball and squash, and Waterpolo has reached its final series.

In hockey, Law and Pharmacy will have their names etched along with St. Mike's on the Jennings Cup.

In Division Two (A), Law dumped Jr Engineering in two straight games to take the title. In the first game, they played way back on the ninth, the score was 4-1 for the Engineers. Steve Smith, Juha Mikelberg, Rob Glass and Mike Thompson scored for Law while M Kramer replied for the Engineers.

Law also took the second and deciding game by a decisive 5-2 score. The scoring was once again distributed throughout the team as Al Parker, Ted Dobson, Mike Ander, Smith and Glass managed to turn on the red light. For Engineers, S Howard and B Laughton scored.

In Division Two (B), Pharmacy was a convincing 5-1 winner over Trinity. In a rough game, Pharmacy was led by D Edwards who scored the hat trick. M Tierney had a goal and two assists while P Russell picked up the other goal. J Abraham responded for Trinity.

One of the most exciting series in the playoffs was provided by Scarborough C and Phys Ed D in the intermediate division. Phys Ed emerged as eventual winners in a closely contested two-game total-goal series.

In the first game, defence was thrown to the wind as both teams were flying, racking up a 6-6 tie. Scarborough got two-goal performances from John Hill and John Izaryck, while Kevin Cassidy and Randy Lanktree picked up singles. Phys Ed was led by captain Steve Crummy who scored twice. Singles went to Wayne Adcoe, Peter Allen, Sal Mannella and Jim Eliopolous.

The tie in the first game turned the second into a sudden-death affair. It was a tight checking game as close as the final 4-3 score indicates. The final Phys Ed goal was scored in the first overtime period.

For Phys Ed, the hero of the day was Tony D'Agostino who scored twice. Eliopolous and Allen scored the other two. Scarborough was paced by Steve (Red Rocket) Quinn who beat the Phys Ed goalie twice. The other goal went to Mike O'Neill.

In Interfac Basketball, the powerful Sr. Engineering team dumped St. Mike's 94-73 to win the Sifton Cup. The game was not nearly as close as most expected between two teams which had shown so much during the regular season.

The Engineers were led by G Digiambattista who outscored everyone in the game with 26 points.

A Mattachineo and R Kopiac also cracked the double figures with 14 points each for the Engineers. For SMC, the scoring was led by Brent Hubbard who hooped 23 points. Rick Voell and A Baje also had 15 points in a losing cause.

In the Intermediate Division, the Black Angels did as expected and downed Civil II 76-66 to take the top prize. The win gave the Angels an undefeated season.

The Angels took a 32-23 half time lead. Civil II gave a couple clues that they might be on the verge of a comeback in the second half, but they could not keep prolonged pressure on their opponents.

In Division One squash action, Meds B pulled a slight upset by defeating Meds A 2-1 to win the Boake Trophy.

Meds A took the first game as Marty Blum downed Steve Kraft 2-0. The B team responded however with two straight wins as Jeff Gollish and Ted Jacobson defeated Mark Cohen and Stu Iglesias by identical 2-0 scores.

Awards To Women

After five years of dedication to the intercollegiate swimming and field hockey teams, Jane Wright has won the Benson Award as the female athlete who demonstrated the most outstanding ability in athletics and scholarship.

Wright, 22, is a fourth year Phys Ed student who has swum for the Blues for five years. In this span she has won two gold, four silver and two bronze medals in intercollegiate competitions.

She has also swum internationally in the 1970 Commonwealth Games, the 1971 Pan Am Games, the 1972 Olympics and the 1973 World Championships.

There were two winners of the Hill-Dash award which is presented to individuals who make an outstanding administrative contribution to U of T athletics. Barb Paterson and Jeanne Gray are this year's winners.

Paterson won her award in recognition of her work at New College. She is the women's Intramural co-ordinator, touch football curator and also ran the co-ed superstars competition and co-ed intramurals.

Gray is most widely known for her work behind the scenes of the women's basketball team which she manages. When she was not on the court, she found time to be a curator for women's ice hockey, and a frequent contributor to Sportsweek and The Varsity.

As well as these prestigious awards, a number of female athletes were presented with silver T's. The T's are the mark of excellence which are attained by consistent outstanding contributions over a number of years.

This year's winners are Cathy Brown, Lynn Halliday, Ann Hofland and Carol MacDougall from the field hockey team; Val Bush and Lynda Harley from ice hockey; Janice Davy (dynamics), Susan Rowley (skiing), Sandy Turney (basketball) and Jane Wright.

Grad Post firing fuels election fight

By ANDREW MAHON

Tomorrow and Friday, U of T graduate students will be voting to select next year's Graduate Student Union (GSU) executive.

Interest in this year's election is greater than in most other years in light of the recent controversy involving the GSU executive and the Grad Post.

This year's race will be contested between the slate of Casey, Wilson, Vanio and Schroeder and a slate called the "Coalition for a Democratic GSU."

While presidential candidate Leo Casey (this year's GSU vice-president) and his slate refused to be interviewed by The Varsity, the Coalition for a Democratic GSU outlined some of their opinions on this upcoming election.

According to presidential candidate Herb Hartmann, the coalition was formed after the GSU meeting which ratified the executive's firing of the Grad Post editor, Maria Horvath.

"We came together after the Grad Post affair due to a common outrage about the tone and tenor of that meeting," said Hartmann, who is a graduate student in the department of philosophy.

Vice-presidential nominee Barb Stewart, a GSU council member in 1977-78, explained that "We thought it was really important not to let a slate with Casey go unchallenged — that was our primary concern."

"One major difference in our slates," continued Stewart, "is that our program is a lot more concrete than theirs (Casey's)."

Both slates oppose cutbacks and are committed to seeking better financial aid for graduate students in the face of a diminishing program of student aid. However, the essential difference between the two campaigns comes down to a difference in the concept of the GSU executive, according to Stewart, who sees "an executive that is a part of the council and responsible to that council."

Part of this year's failed responsibility can be seen in some of the constitutional faux pas' made by this year's executive, according to secretary candidate Tom Kuhn.

"It's supposed to be a bi-weekly council," says Kuhn, "but this year they had half the minimum number of meetings. They also scheduled the elections a week after classes ended until council member Stewart amended the motion."

Treasurer candidate Ian Tripp is intent on removing the secrecy involved with the finances of the GSU. Tripp points to the management of the GSU restaurant

Annual 20 per cent fee hike -- or decline

By ALAN STEWART

An annual increase in tuition fees of about 20 per cent over the next five years is the only possible alternative to the possible irreversible decline in quality of the Ontario university system if the provincial Government's plans for restraint funding are followed, according to the Council of Ontario Universities (COU).

"The Price of Restraint," a report prepared by the COU, the provincial Government's advisory body on university affairs, predicted that the process would result in a doubling of the present level of tuition fees by 1981.

The report, released Friday, emphasized that the long-term implications of the university system's "New Reality" is somewhat of a departure from COU's previous practice of concentrating on annual recommendations to the Government through the Ontario Council on University Affairs (OCUA), a lobbying body for the universities of Ontario.

The report, prepared by the COU's Committee on Operating Grants for OCUA, says the university system needs $994.3-million for 1979-80 to maintain an acceptable quality, an increase of 6.9 per cent over 1978-79 levels. However, the anticipated decline in university enrolment and the resultant decrease in tuition fee income means the university system needs $803.6-million in operating grants from the Government, an increase of 9.1 per cent over 1978-79 funding levels.

Last year, the COU asked for an increase in operating grants of $68.5-million (7.7 per cent); OCUA recommended a boost of $51.9-million (5.8 per cent); the Government granted $41-million (4.6 per cent).

In the long run, the council attempted to estimate the effects on Ontario universities if the Ontario Government continues to restrain spending according to its plans as announced in its 1977 budget. Operating grants could be expected to increase by a rate falling between 4.5 per cent and 5.8 per cent each year.

If this were to happen, COU suggests that the universities would have no alternative but to fire faculty and support staff, since salaries form 80 per cent of university budgets. The "most favorable government funding model" would leave the system with 800 fewer faculty members than COU thinks is necessary to maintain minimum standards; the least favorable model would cause a "shortfall" of 1,400 faculty.

Although the COU suggests that annual 20 per cent hikes in tuition fees would be a logical way out, it calls such a measure "unacceptable." The COU recommends tuition fee increases of between 4.5 and 5.8 per cent a year, roughly in line with increases in operating grants.

The COU also has some harsh things to say about OCUA's standards of university "productivity" measured by the ratio of faculty to enrolment.

The report suggests that a lower ratio of faculty members to students signifies not a decline in "productivity," but an increase in quality of education, urging that OCUA give up the idea of measuring "productivity" entirely.

"What is at stake," the report concludes, "is the Ontario university system as we know it. In a very real way, as well, what is at stake is the future."

Erindale elects dog, ECSU elections "a joke"

By SEAN DUNPHY

Ray Easterbrook won the Erindale College Student Union (ECSU) presidency by 130 votes, but the elections "were just a joke, the whole way down the line" according to Greg Tyndall, an unsuccessful candidate for ECSU president in the race last week.

Tyndall listed five election irregularities which, he said, prove that Chief Returning Officer Gordon Shantz broke the rules he wrote two weeks before the elections. While he doubts that the actual outcome of the election was altered, Tyndall said that because of these irregularities, one can never know "beyond a shadow of a doubt who would have won."

Tyndall said that he is not trying to overturn the election results, as this would result in a "hassle for Ray Easterbrook and everybody concerned," but is fighting for the principle involved. Tyndall said he was disappointed that "all of our effort was wasted because of the same kind of ECSU incompetence that we were trying to fight" by running.

The charges laid by Tyndall have been forwarded to Governing Council, the Ombudsman, and were to have been discussed at the ECSU Board of Directors meeting which was postponed on Monday. Tyndall's charges were:

- that the ballot boxes, which according to Shantz's election rules were not to have been opened before March 29 at 4 p.m., were opened several times prior to that by Shantz, without a scrutineer present, to make room for more ballots, and "just to see how things were going."

- that there were election posters near polling stations contrary to election rules.

- that affiliations for the five ECSU commissions in the Easterbrook slate of candidates were indicated on the ballot, despite the fact that the election rules clearly stated that slate affiliations were not to be printed. Easterbrook was the only candidate to organize a slate, and his entire slate was elected.

- that joke candidates were knowingly permitted to stand, despite the provision in the rules that all candidates be registered students. These candidates included a four-year-old Golden Labrador retriever named Mike Robertson, who was elected to the Commission on Academic Affairs, and Wellington Womble who ran unsuccessfully for president. Wellington Womble was an alias used by Rick Harrison of Radio Erindale.

Tyndall also charged that a breakdown in communications between Shantz and ECSU president Rob Mowat resulted in an unfair advantage being given to Easterbrook's vice-president Bill Train over Tyndall's vice-president Jules Bloch at an all candidates meeting March 27. Bloch had been told by Mowat that he would not have to speak, while Train was told by Shantz that he would be asked to speak. The result was that Train delivered a prepared speech to the audience of nearly 100, while Bloch delivered a brief off-the-cuff address.

Shantz replied that the broken rules are "a matter of interpretation. Some were bent, at best, by myself" for practical reasons. He dismissed Tyndall's charges saying that the irregularities he saw would have had little effect on the outcome of the election.

Wellington Womble, or Rick Harrison, was permitted to run for president, said Shantz, "to make a point." Womble, like ECSU president Mowat, who ran unsuccessfully for president on the Silly Party ticket, was protesting the lack of student interest in ECSU and in the elections. The dog was left on the ballot accidentally, according to Shantz. Shantz said that although he knew of Robertson's genius after the ballots had gone to the printer, he forgot to take his name off the ballot the day of the elections when he struck off Mowat's running mates from the Silly Party, Mulhall and Alcock, after they withdrew.

Shantz said that he takes responsibility for the printing of slate affiliations on the ballot. The mistake came about while he was "shooting the breeze" with the Reform group runs

By PAUL F. ROONEY

A reform group within the U of T Staff Association (UTSA) is attempting to elect three members to the five-member UTSA executive with the ultimate objective of gaining union certification for the association.

UTSA, comprising all non-academic, non-unionized university employees has a present membership of 7-800 of the total 3,500 eligible employees or less than 25 per cent.

Group spokesman Mike Jackel, running for first vice-president, emphasized that the reform group is committed to working within the present UTSA organization. He said the group's aim is to form an independent union representing only U of T staff.

Jackel is concerned about imminent financial restraints and staff layoffs. Without any legal status the staff are vulnerable and have little leverage in any negotiating process. "People are realizing they have no way of protecting themselves," said Jackel.

Jackel pointed out that voluntary recognition of UTSA as a bargaining unit by the university, similar to that given the U of T Faculty Association, is no solution. In recent negotiations UTFA "didn't get much for it; they need something more," he said.

U of T president-elect James Ham said in a telephone interview that UTSA had been treated as fairly as UTFA. He said that if they wished to seek certification, "it's their privilege."

Jackel says that "at least 100" present members favor the reform solution, and that their support is broad-based over the entire campus. They are not a small group just trying to take over, he emphasized. The present executive "has good ideas, but they always run up against the fact that they have no legal power," he stated.

Jackel admits that a "fairly large block" of the membership were against certification before, but added that dissatisfaction with the recent UTSA negotiation results may persuade some of them of the merits of certification.

Jackel explained that the group wants nothing to do with the Canadian Union of Public Employees. Three previous attempts within the last five years by others to organize with CUPE have been unsuccessful. An independent union can best serve the needs of the U of T staff, Jackel said. He said he hopes that the staff will be able to see the value of having their own association.

UTSA elections will be held April 26.

Frenzied programmers panic

By JOHN D'ANGELO

A tradition at U of T in the most arduous of scholastic seasons is the end-of-year computer programming mania. It has once again overcome the spirits of hundreds of students buried in the heap of final assignments.

Most notable of the usual campus hot spots include the Arts and Science Undergraduate Terminal (ASUT) and the Engineering Undergraduate Terminal (EUT), where huge queues of anxious students form as they wait to run their programs, each student fondling his or her computer deck in great expectation of that elusive perfect run.

But this year, veteran observers have noticed that the frenzy has reached unprecedented proportions. Lineups at ASUT are regularly protruding into the Sid Smith corridor. High Speed Job Stream turnaround times of over half an hour are not uncommon. Printers are breaking down from excessive non-stop usage and students, unable to find space in the workrooms, are forced to examine their listings on any available space in the corridors or stairwells.

Even the most diligent computer aficionados who sleep by day (or not at all) and run their programs at night are finding little relief from the annoying lineups. A headcount by this bemused reporter several days ago (also working on an overdue assignment) revealed over 100 students working at the EUT facilities at 3:30 on a weekday morning, and most of them weren't even aspiring pre-med students.

The Varsity — John D'Angelo

"Oh no, don't tell me I need another do loop."

It is in these tense hours that the true undaunting spirit of the student programmer comes to the fore. The art of efficient keypunching is immediately abandoned for more staid moments. While waiting in line to use the card reader, users can be seen mumbling reassurances to themselves that the last error just corrected was the final bug in the program.

Amongst the din of keypunches, printers, and readers, neophyte programmers can be heard uttering deep, dark remarks like, "Oh no, don't tell me I need another do loop," while the more seasoned veterans scrounge through manuals insisting aloud that they've just discovered a compiler bug.

As the night lingers on, the less vigilant of the fruitless workers discover that table tops and broken keypunches can be a welcome berth on which to catch 40 winks while waiting for a printout.

With the approach of dawn and its sobering influence, the most desperate of students abandon all hope and pour through piles of waste paper, hoping to find someone's listing of a better program (a practice not uncommon even among graduate level courses), while still other students begin writing their final reports in a deteriorated handwriting, illegible even to themselves.

As the completed assignment is discarded on the marker's desk, the lonely computer programmer's thoughts turn to comforting serenities, like lying in bed reading a good IBM manual.

"Sylvestre's" which has run at an annual deficit of $10,000 for the past three years.

"We want to make sure that the books are open," explained Tripp, "so students will know what our budget is — it's their money, but right now we have no understanding of how our money is handled."

Tripp, who is a student in management studies, adds that if their slate is elected, it will be the first time someone with some kind of financial training will be able to contribute intelligently to financial planning.

While Stewart is pleased there is a slate to contest Casey's bid for next year's executive, she is perturbed by two aspects of this year's election.

"It's unfortunate that there's been a lot of name calling in this election," points out Stewart, "and it's also unfortunate that the GAA endorsed Casey's slate without listening to our proposals."

Stewart and the rest of the slate believe that this year's executive lost a lot of credibility through the Grad Post incident.

"We're hoping to try and correct that by making the GSU executive more responsible," concluded Stewart.

CASEY OUT

We have rarely taken stands in the past on Graduate Student Union elections. Usually the races have been lopsided and elicited tiny student interest. Often entire slates have been acclaimed due to lack of competition — that's how the present GSU executive, Stratton, Casey, et al, came to power.

This year the contest has raised great graduate, and even undergraduate, interest. On one side is Leo Casey's slate and on the other is the Coalition for a Democratic GSU.

As GSU vice-president Casey has been the "brains" behind the firing of Grad Post editor Maria Horvath, a student government should not be able to pressure, let alone close down, a student newspaper because it doesn't support the government wholeheartedly. Moreover, no one should be subjected to the attacks, legalistic manipulations and deliberate gossip-mongering Ms. Horvath has suffered at the hands of Casey and his gang.

Casey is also the spokesman for the GSU executive who kept the GSU council and grad students in the dark about the Grad Post issue for two months — until after the executive decreed Horvath was fired.

Casey and his friends mobilized the same kind of despicable attacks against council member Tom Kuhn after Kuhn dared to question the executive in a general council meeting. The message was, "Question our executive privilege and you'll encounter an organized slander and political attack designed to shut you up."

It's about time some serious grad students opposed those guys. They've been monopolising what's left of the GSU for too long.

Casey's literature has the nerve to call for an "effective and democratic" GSU. Democracy is only a word to those who have consistently moved towards consolidating power in the hands of the executive. Kuhn has repeatedly pointed out the GSU executive is the agent of the GSU council and grad students, not the imperial cabinet.

How democratic is a GSU that pushes for motions in the coalitions against cutbacks that would limit decision-making to "leaders" of student associations? Instead of building a mass movement of all students against cutbacks, this kind of manoeuvre keeps the strings in the hands of the official GSU representative, the official GAA representative, the official OFS representative, etc., etc.

How "effective" the GSU is in fighting cutbacks is illustrated by Casey's behaviour on March 16. Students from all over Ontario heckled as he spoke and spoke and spoke at Convocation Hall, listing every cutback misery he could think of, boasting about U of T's "prestige," and warning the students about subversives. The students' response of "Let's go!" undercut his litany of pessimism.

To top it off, Casey aligned himself with the police and fought against students at the Queen's Park demonstration. "Effective" marshalling?

Herb Hartmann, Barb Stewart, Tom Kuhn and Ian Tripp stand for the opposite. They don't have all the "connections". Their platform calls for a democratic GSU with an executive that's responsible to the council and to graduate students. Honest, democratic people should be given the chance to clean up the mess created by the clique that has run the GSU into the ground for the last number of years.

Cook wrong

With regards to the March 15 article by George Cook ("SAC Didn't Back Occupiers") I would like to make some comments. Of the $5,000 allotted Radio Varsity, at least $1,500 will be used to expand radio distribution on campus. This was clear, stated several times by the staff of Radio Varsity who attended the SAC meeting.

In a conversation with Mr. Cook I pointed out that a portion of SAC's money must go towards necessities. Beyond these expenses, the funds that SAC has given to Radio Varsity will go towards improving the distribution system as the staff of Radio Varsity consists of entirely volunteer labour. It is true that the revitalization of our distribution system is limited by the amount that is at our disposal. But we are grateful for the pledge of support that SAC and various colleges and residences have demonstrated towards Radio Varsity and the concept of campus radio.

Most disappointed

Having attended the student demonstration at Queen's Park on March 16 and heard the CFTO 1830 hr, Global 220 hr and CBC 2300 hr reports I was most disappointed I had hoped that Mr. Davis and/or Mr. Parrott would explain government policy from their point of view. I had hoped that the media would expand on the point expressed by the speakers representing students, faculty, labour and the opposition parties that cutbacks in post-secondary education are just one facet of a large problem affecting all Ontarians. The Davis government is balancing the budget by cutting social services not its own inefficiency.

Where are the comments on the public financed trip abroad with $250 a day expense accounts? On overpaid bureaucrats? On MPP's voting themselves a pay raise? It's not just that my post-secondary education is a financial burden on my relatively well-off parents that my classrooms are dirty and crowded; that my labs are overcrowded, understaffed and ill-supplied; that many of my friends don't expect to find jobs in their fields on graduation even though there is a crying need for special education classes, daycare, and social workers, even though hospitals are criminally understaffed, that the Davis government apparently plans to let this get worse. It's unemployment. It's lack of affordable daycare. It's lack of affordable, purchasable housing. Where will the money come from to support the retired-at-60-living-80-have-no-capital elderly 30 and 40 years from now? It's mismanaged health care heavy in paperwork and low in quality and efficiency. It's legislation taking years to get through the House. It's unpredictable funding for social services.

Mr. Cassidy and Mr. Smith intimated that they have constructive solutions to these problems. Well, gentlemen, put your money where your mouth is. Force an election from a government and put your plans into action.

Editor blameless

The relations between Grad Post editor Maria Horvath and the GSU executive became intolerable. There is no question about that. I question, however, that the weight of the blame for this fact should rest on the editor's shoulders.

I admit that I base this view on personal experience. I wrote three articles for the Grad Post this year. In my dealings with Maria Horvath I found her to be friendly, considerate, helpful and efficient. She also struck me as being very dedicated to the paper. I believe that this view is generally shared by other people who wrote for the Grad Post. The charges of the GSU suggest that Miss Horvath was simply not able to work with other people. I found this not to be the case. I never could reconcile my knowledge of her with the GSU's representation of the Grad Post editor as an erratic incompetent monster at 16 Bancroft. Obviously, after studying the editor's work and hearing both sides of the case, the CUP commission also failed to reconcile its findings with this picture. It found no grounds for dismissal. However, when this impartial inquiry did not give legitimacy to its wishes, the GSU simply chose to ignore it.

The GSU's failure to see its firing of Miss Horvath as an affront to the principle of the freedom of the press makes the future prospects of the Grad Post look rather dim. Hopefully, it will not simply become an organ for the views of the GSU. It is also to be hoped that there will be better relations between the GSU executive and the next editor of the paper if the upcoming elections provide us with new representatives, this could well be a step in the right direction.

Fighting racism

Kirk Spence has emerged as a great defender of the racist and fascist Pitman Report on racism in Toronto and perpetrator of the slanderous line that blames the people and not the rich for racist attacks (Varsity, March 3).

The Joint Committee (made up of the East Indian Defence Committee, West Indian People's Organization and Canadian People's (Citizens and Residents) Defence Committee) gave its views in the Varsity and at a meeting at the International Students Centre on March 1 which I attended and explained the points which Spence seeks to confuse.

Actual life experience has shown that racist attacks on the immigrant communities are organized by the state. Was it not the opinions

Not applicable

As an active Varsity staffer I must register my objections to several points raised in the editorial entitled "Our Cops Are Tops". Instead of offering constructive criticism on the demonstration itself, the editorial has chosen to label the organizers of Ontario's most successful student demonstration a history "sell-outs", a term which is not applicable to most of their actions.

The Ontario Federation of Students must be given credit for their role in co-ordinating and organizing Thursday's demonstration, and organizers as the editorial did in only writing about the end of the rally and not about anything else, is an abandonment of the role of responsible journalism to which my paper subscribes. Since, as the Varsity has so often stated, they are supposed to further the cause of students, how was the cause furthered by Friday's editorial?

And criticism such as "we could go on and on with the list of betrayals by the people who are supposed to be leading us against our common enemy" when it is unsubstantiated does not leave the reader with a high regard for the level of debate in our editorials.

The editorial states "that in our fight against cutbacks, student bureaucrats are not a help... and that if we want to win our demands we have to organize without counting on the leaders we have now." If we're talking about the police, then the editorial totally ignores the brief submitted to the Ontario Cabinet by OFS, the list against cutbacks, and the new OSAP proposal all of which OFS has done a lot of work on, and which our own paper has covered.

There were unfortunate incidents by the student leaders at the end of the rally. It was too bad that Kevin Schweker of Hyerson and Miriam Edison of OFS could not properly control the crowd, and that there was no outlet for the crowd's frustration. But aside from those serious mistakes at the end of the rally, the students who gave of their time to see the whole thing up, must be encouraged and constructively criticized in our editorials in their efforts, rather than painting all of their actions with the same brush.

My criticism of the police and student marshals at the end of the rally still stands though, and in discussions with many of the organizers since Friday, several comments are in order.

It appears that the organizers of the rally were afraid that the students would not purposely disrupt the rally, so as to create a confrontation with the police, which the disruptors would later use to discredit OFS and the student leaders, and that is why the marshals sought to prevent an outbreak of violence. And that is why the marshals were in principle with civil disobedience (occupying university offices, an act which was roundly applauded by the crowd at Con Hall, is no different than occupying the Legislature) disagreed with the timing of the attempt to enter the Legislature, saying that with cops outside and inside, there would have been busted, and a riot would have ensued had students pushed the police without the marshals standing in the front lines.

In response, I must say that contrary to the opinion held by the student leaders, it was the non-aligned students who were doing most of the pushing and shoving at the front. At the start of the march, I was with those who are accused of fomenting a riot, and they were not enough to mob the Legislature. I still say that even with the cops there it would have been an appropriate tactic. True, some violence would have occurred, but if students are willing to take on the cops, then let them. As could be seen, no one was willing to do so on Thursday, and therefore no violence occurred. Was the violence at demonstrations against the Vietnam war worthwhile? I would submit yes, and while cutbacks cannot compare, obviously, with such an issue, the principle of fighting for what you believe in still holds true for both demonstrations.

OFS and the student leaders must realize the position of the students in the rally. Their very real anger, the mistakes the OFS made at the end of the rally (such as the "like at summer camp" was a bad move), and improve on that for the next time. So while I congratulate the OFS and the other organizers for getting the students to the rally, I strongly disapprove of what they did at the end of the rally.

A clear choice

In few elections is the choice so clear as in the present election for the Graduate Student Union executive. The choice is between a discredited past and a possible future.

The Leo Casey slate means more of the same, financially mismanaged, scandal-ridden government to which we have been subjected over the past year. The current GSU executive (which both includes and endorses Casey) is guilty of repeated, serious constitutional violations, ranging from the number of general council meetings not held to the amount of money not returned to the departmental associations to the timing and calling of the very GSU elections in which Casey is now a candidate.

Current GSU finance is a big question mark. A recent $1500 GSU check that was sent to OISE, to one of the course unions which it is the GSU's primary responsibility to serve, bounced. The OISE course union has yet to recover the money. This sort of fiscal irresponsibility is inexcusable. A professionally trained GSU treasurer is needed.

Since January Leo Casey has invested the greatest part of his time and, by all indications, a considerable amount of GSU money in his manic campaign to shut down the Grad Post. This is Casey's only accomplishment, mounting a smear campaign against a professional journalist. The other campaigns for which he claims credit are all large massive efforts which would have moved forward with or without Leo Casey.

Casey's list of endorsements is similarly deceptive. He is endorsed by the eight members of the G.A.A. not by a vote of the two thousand union members. Endorsements of Casey from other members of the GSU executive, who joined him in shutting down the Grad Post, ring hollow. Many of the "committees" that have endorsed Casey are simply different names for the same small group of individuals, one of whom is Casey himself. Harold Wadlinger (to cite one example) appears three times, first as a member of the G.A.A. executive, again as past G.A.A. president and finally as Electrical Engineering steward.

The two slates in this election can easily be distinguished. In contrast to Casey's call for a continuation of the cliquish, scandal-ridden, secretive, mismanaged government of executive rule, the COALITION FOR A DEMOCRATIC GSU has committed itself to a completely open GSU government, full participation by GSU Council in decision-making, GSU books open to all members, financial management of the GSU by a treasurer professionally trained for the task, and reinstatement of Maria Horvath as Grad Post editor coupled with full compliance with all Canadian University Press recommendations for a free and independent Grad Post.

Leo Casey offers us experience but not the sort that we should embrace. Rather, Casey himself represents the only issue in this campaign — the lack of constitutional, democratic government at the GSU. Casey should not be elected GSU president because, despite having had the support of Maria Horvath as Grad Post editor qualified for the position. His campaign to shut down the Grad Post provides us with the only clear indication we have as to the kind of GSU president Leo Casey would be. Having discredited himself in full public view, Casey would be an impotent voice both at Simcoe Hall and at Queen's Park.

Thus, the reason for defeating the Casey slate and the reason for electing the Coalition candidates are one and the same: such action may be the last opportunity for a healthy, democratic and effective Graduate Student Union.

The time has come for a change at the GSU.

Soviet Anti-Semitism

Professor Dan Goldstick/Varsity, Mar. 17/ wants to have proof that official Soviet anti-Semitism is not just a "myth". I cannot provide him with an example from the Soviet Union since that country is neither my field nor my love, but perhaps a proof from "independent" Czechoslovakia will do. I put the word "independent" in quotation marks, following Professor Goldstick's example: for some reason he does this to all words with non-Communist overtones, e.g. "freedom", "human rights", etc.

In 1974 a novel came out in Prague written by Alexej Pludek and entitled Vaband/Va banque/ its hero, Bohata, gradually discovers the lingering evil of what really was behind the seemingly popular movement of Alexander Dubcek. He eventually finds a conspiracy directed from abroad, and on his way to that historical discovery he keeps unweaving conspirators, one by one.

They are a strange lot. So one Mischa Taub, an author of satirical verses, described as having a "solid appearance", receives orders from his conspiratorial bosses somewhere in the West to steal a manuscript novel by an American writer by the name of Tyrone Whitehead who is "unknown in the States because he has no money for advertising"; but who, in the opinion of the conspirators, is "a brilliant stylist and an excellent observer". Taub is to rewrite the book a little, change the locality from the US to Czechoslovakia, and replace American names with cosmopolitan sounding ones. The work is then to be published under Taub's name, translated into many languages and promoted so heavily that Mischa Taub will become an international literary celebrity. The meaning of this episode is simply to illustrate how certain writers, who are members of Kalka, Werfel etc., establish their reputation. Mischa Taub is, as they say in Staines, "a person of Jewish origin."

But he is not the only person of that origin to participate in the counterrevolution of 1988, and except for his complexion and incurable habit of undressing pretty girls in his mind (typically Jewish), he is relatively likable. More detestable is a comrade Neumann, the director of an institute that decides which Czech authors will or will not be published in the West. He is a conspirator, have their men in all strategic literary positions. This man speaks badly-broken Czech, a kind of Black Sambo speech the like of which I encountered for the last time on the pages of The Aryan Struggle, published in Prague between 1939-1945: "Comrade Tomek, why to be published Petr Bezruc; nein? Who him be, this Bezruc, nein? He not be workers Klasse, Salesian songs, what kind Salesian songs? Das ist rich poetry for dez working Klasse, nein?"

But even his portrait is relatively tame. Much worse is a comrade Horský (do not be misled by the Czech-sounding name: it was originally Bergmann which translates into Czech as Horský). This gentleman "looks like Goshawk" and "is a real piece of shit" at time, and when one of them gets pregnant he mercilessly repudiates her — which is really part of the Bergmann family tradition. His grandfather, a wealthy exploiter in Moravia, behaves as an exemplary character from the horror stories of the Prague ghetto. In Julius Streicher's Der Sturmer. He threatened the poor shareholder Skala that he would have him chased out of his hut if he did not order his seventeen year old daughter Maruska to come to Bergmann and grant him his prime nocturnal desires. Nevertheless, he persuaded his daughter, I don't know, says the hero of the novel. "What the unlucky mother must have been through, I do not want to know, and how the poor girl felt when she stumbled secretly at night to the lecherous polbely, I cannot describe. Nevertheless, she then goes on to describe how the raped virgin drowned herself, how her boyfriend killed the dirty Jew with an axe, and was hanged for it — an act of class justice! — in the town of Opava.

Nearly a further I don't know so. In short: according to Bohata's findings, the entire recent history of the Czechs was planned by the Elders of Zion, strictly according to the famous Protocols.

In the crucial ideological passage of the novel, Bohata reads, an Al Farabi corist, who conveniently pops up in Prague, discloses to Bohata the real history of the Jews. "What have they ever done for the growth of human happiness?" he asks rhetorically, and immediately answers himself: "They have created the Jewish word about other nations." Bohata, cast in the role of an advocatus diaboli, objects: "They were persecuted, they suffered..." "When? Tell me when did they suffer?" exclaims Bohata. "Did they ever work as serfs? As slaves? As serfs? As slaves? Then indulged in slave trade!" The ghettoes...," gasps Bohata. "A privileged territory! A city district with self-government! Something that not even your own people in their own land had!" "Pogroms..." is another shy reminder of the word. "Yes, they were a desperate poor who had been impoverished by their repaid their violence by committing violence against one single individual, thousands of such poor were killed in the next war. Do you call that suffering?" But what about fascism? I grin. "You killed five million, innocent Jews." — "Fifty million innocent people were killed in that war!" etc.

Spreading racial hatred is forbidden by law in the Czechoslovak Socialist Republic. But perhaps the above quoted discourse on spreading philosophical truth. Yet, it would, perhaps, not be a proof of official anti-Semitism if the novel were an obscurely published piece of hack writing by an unknown scribbler from the lunatic fringe of the Czech society. But the author, Mr. Pudek, is a well known writer, and manager of one of the most important publishing establishments in Prague. His concoction was published by the Czechoslovak Writers Union Publishing House, the biggest in the country, and the Czech literary competition sponsored by the Union of Czech Writers, by the Czechoslovak Literary Guild and by the Union of Czechoslovak Publishing Houses in 1973 to commemorate the 25th anniversary of the communist takeover of Czechoslovakia in 1948. This, in my opinion, makes it all pretty official.

And Czechoslovakia is an "independent" country of the Soviet "brotherhood" of nations. (Abel and Kahn were also brothers, goes a Czech joke.)

It is only a novel. But literary scribbles, unlike oral testimonies of refugees from the Soviet bloc countries, manet. Too bad — too good for Professor of Philosophy Goldstick — that so few Czech writers can be so observant and so articulate in the language of their own country.

Fight attacks

The students who demonstrated March 16 at Queen's Park against cutbacks in education spending and who denounced the "student leaders" as sell-outs have been mentioned in the Varsity opinion pages by Shane Parkhill (March 22), Terry Weatherhead, and the Simcoe Hall occupiers (March 29).

I hail the fighting spirit of the students in this militant demonstration. Our message to the government was clear: we will not stand for the cutbacks! We must organize, relying on our own strength, keeping the initiative on our own hands, and fight tooth and nail against these attacks by the government and university and college administrations. We must fight to make the rich pay!

We must also fight against the attacks and sell-out misleadership of various elements who want to lead our light astray. From the path of defending our basic interests, they try to lure us onto the path of capitulation in the face of these attacks and to defeat, promoting the lies that this or that social democratic or revisionist political party has concocted to the economic crisis. All we must do, they say, is crawl on bended knees and beg for reforms from the same government that is shifting the burden of the economic crisis onto the backs of all sections of the people across Canada in service of the rich.

They sow pessimism and defeatism among our ranks and stand for the liquidation of our fight.

Parkhill, Weatherhead & company slander the students, charging they do not want to oppose these "student leaders" or that they were dupes of outside "subversives", as warned against by GSU vice-president Leo Casey in his speech at Convocation Hall just before the demonstration.

Further, they have launched numerous attacks against myself on campus and particularly in the opinion pages of the Varsity. Because I stand for organizing students to fight the attacks launched against them, they oppose and expose the schemes of these traitors to the students, they have fabricated stories and given me a role in the March 16 demonstration which they proceed to attack.

They deliberately refuse to deal with the politics for which I stand.

They also jump to the defence of the "student leaders" — OFS, GSU, SAC and other student council rags and their flunkies. These "leaders" not only told the students at Queen's Park to go home as soon as they got there, and to be respectful, but from where they stood shoulder to shoulder with the police they also hit students and swung at their banners and placards.

Since his letter was printed Parkhill has admitted that he could not and did not see me at the front of the demonstration and admitted that he didn't know if I played any role in the movement of students to break through the police and "student leaders" barricade.

During the short time I was at the front of the demonstration, facing the police and "student leaders" barricade, I witnessed a great surge forward from the students behind me. Hundreds were calling out "sell out" against these "student leaders", demanded that Davis and Parrott face the students and account for themselves, and declared that they would go in and get Davis and Parrott if they didn't show face. Hundreds of students were pushing forward with great anger and contempt for the government, its police and their agents among the students.

Meanwhile Weatherhead sang camp songs to us from the steps of Queen's Park.

Despite the betrayal by these fire-fighters for the government and the rich minority — stamping out the flames of student opposition — our demonstration will grow. As students unite in action against the main enemy and all its agents among the students and as we prepare ourselves against the increased attacks by the government and the inevitable attacks by their police, we will make the rich pay for the economic crisis and will win an education that serves the basic interests of the people!

"Con job" inflicted

What a "con job" is being inflicted upon students and the people of Ontario! The self-righteousness of Dr. Parrott, used in an attempt to discredit students and set the general population against students is really enough to make this observer sick to her stomach. I never thought I'd see the day when students would be the sole defenders of society's interests, and made to feel guilty about their desire to maintain even the status quo of educational standards in Ontario. And I am certainly disgusted to hear figures being bandied about by the minister that appear to demean and distort the contributions of students to society both financially and in our present and future efforts.

Most importantly, the figure of 17% financial contribution to education represented by tuition fees must be contested. First, this is hardly a "subsidy" in the sense of a "gift" which students get and others supposedly do not receive. For if one considers society as a whole, and compares it more fairly to those given by government to businesses, etc., it becomes quite clear that no subsidy is given in this economy unless there is a very high expectation of return on the government's "investment". Also, the figure of 17% is a average that includes courses such as Arts (where the tuition contribution is actually more like 40-50% at most universities) and those very expensive technical courses like Dentistry, Medicine or Scientific Research where a student would have to have a professional salary to afford the course even before he or she began. In other words, in these courses, the tuition contribution is less than 17% due to equipment costs, etc. Obviously, most students cannot afford to "buy" their way into society by paying for an education outright. This society pools its resources so that its needs will eventually be met. Why then, make students feel guilty about receiving an education for which they will be repaid in society all their mortal lives? The economy is down and the Conservative government finds it more expedient to tear a large, gaping hole in the very fabric of society by attacking Education. Why? Because the universities cannot show an immediate prime for figures in this struggle is vulnerable with the rest of the "services" of Society. The present government seeks to make itself look good in the short term, and perhaps also (as pointed out by one of the students in the recent Varsity survey) to make the prospective candidate for Rosedale look "tough" on students in the coming election.

The figure of 70% of people who do not go to university shows a despicable gap in logic as well. Only recently were people who could not afford a university education encouraged by the use of grants, etc., to fulfill their potential in this regard. It is a proven point that poor people are much less willing to compromise their small security by taking on more debts. Dr. Parrott himself is denying this 70% of which he speaks the right to an education at the post-secondary level with the reduction of grants. At the same time he sympathizes with the 70%, pointing to his political motives, he does not present constructive alternatives. How dare he put the blame for this situation on those few who have made it into the system! And especially, how dare he chastize those who are already in debt and making an effort to complete their education, or whose parents have struggled and also perhaps gone into debt to give their children (and their country) educational resources. If there have been some small inroads made by poorer people into those "expensive" fields of medicine, dentistry, research, etc., it is obvious that the shortsightedness of Dr. Parrott and the government that supports him will effectively wipe out any vestige of progress that was meagerly achieved in more prosperous years, and that must see us through lean times in the future. Let us hope the voters of this province (and most students have the vote, as do their families) will not be fooled by sleight-of-hand budgets and nonsense.

Lenin vs Whites

The Toronto Anarchist League (TAL) has added its voice to the old myths of the Kronstadt rebellion and of peasant warrior Maknho, but has merely repeated the usual anti-communist calumny against the Bolshevik government of early Soviet Russia (Varsity, 13 March). As we demonstrated in our last letter on the subject (Varsity, 8 March), the Kronstadt mutiny of 1921 was an attempted armed uprising against the Imperialist-encircled, economically shattered "Russian workers' state." The Bolshevik government had the right and duty to suppress this rebellion, which could only have served Imperialist White reaction's attempt to overthrow the proletarian dictatorship.

The TAL asserts that the sailors of Kronstadt 1921 were the same ones who fought heroically in the October Revolution. This is a baseless lie and vile slander against the proletarians in uniform who led Red Kronstadt in 1917. Even Avrich recognizes that by 1921, "more than three-quarters were of peasant origin." They reflected the narrow social interests of the Russian peasants, who were rebelling against the strikers who were rebelling against the forced requisitioning of grain by the state, which had led to resort to such measures to provide food for the starving, destitute cities.

The TAL further implies that strikers in Petrograd were sympathetic to the rebellion. Another lie. The Petrograd strikers, who had experienced the peasants' extortionate black market profiteering, were hostile to the rebellion, and supported its suppression. In fact, the one mainland rebellion in sympathy with Kronstadt was led by an ex-tsarist, pro-Imperialist commander of riflemen at nearby Oranienbaum, who raised the anti-Semitic war-cry, "Go to Petrograd and beat the Jews."

The pro-anarchist scholar Avrich blows the whole anarchist myth to smithereens when he relates how the principal leader of the rebellion had unsuccessfully tried to join the White army several months before. Kronstadt 1921 goes on to point out that, after their defeat at Kronstadt, the leaders of the mutiny fled to Finland, where they entered into an open alliance with White counterrevolutionaries. The joint program they agreed to included a call for the establishment of a "temporary military dictatorship" after the overthrow of the Bolsheviks!

The case of the Ukrainian peasant leader and bandit Maknho was even more obviously a military question involving a peasant uprising. During the civil war Maknho led his army in many battles against the White army. But, again reflecting the immediate and narrow interests of the peasantry, he resisted all forms of central authority other than his own. Not only was he undependable, but he often led his forces into clashes with the Red Army, killing Communists. This pitted him in a conflict with the workers' government. He lost and was disbanded by the Red Army.

Paraphrasing, there is another thing about Maknho which we would like to draw to the TAL's attention. In the course of his career, this brigand found it necessary to create his own secret police, an Anarchist Cheka, to control his liefland. Perhaps the armchair Anarchists of Toronto should reconsider Maknho's place in their pantheon of "anti-statist" heroes?

The TAL's stupid statement that "Trotsky had a congenital hatred for the poor peasantry" is beneath contempt. It is a slander borrowed from the Stalinist school of falsification. Perhaps the TAL first read it in the transcript of the Moscow Trials — trials which were, incidentally, supported at the time by the anarchist CNT of Spain. The TAL claims to be appalled that Trotsky was the son of well-off peasants. For our part, we refuse to stoop to such apologetic and juvenile baiting about the class background of committed revolutionaries. The followers of anarchist Prince Peter Kropotkin would be well advised to do the same.

Like Lenin and the other Bolshevik leaders, Trotsky sought to win the oppressed poor peasants to the side of the working class — the only class with the social power to overthrow capitalism and reorganize production in the interests of all the toiling masses. Support from the landless peasantry was essential if the proletariat of Russia was to successfully seize and consolidate state power. The peasant-based revolts of Kronstadt and Maknho were forcibly suppressed because they threatened to undermine the Soviet state's defenses and open the road to the oppression and terror of renewed bourgeois rule.

The anarchists of TAL may try to kid themselves that they are revolutionaries, but in their self-imposed impotence they are nothing of the sort. They have no program to offer the workers and oppressed, other than meaningless fantasies of a fully-blown communist paradise emerging magically from nowhere. But the bourgeoisie is not about to give up its power without a fight, and only a workers' state — the dictatorship of the proletariat — can suppress the class enemy and organize society in the period following the seizure of state power. With the development of the productive forces under international proletarian rule, society will develop towards the elimination of scarcity and the achievement of communism, and the state will gradually wither away.

The anarchists would rather wave their black flags and indulge in empty-headed idealism, than grasp this political reality. It is instructive however to see what happened when an anarchist movement really had some social weight and the support of thousands of workers. We are referring to Spain in the 1930's.

In the mid-1930's, the anarchists of the Spanish CNT (the people who wouldn't support a workers' government) joined the capitalist profit front government and helped crush the proletarian uprising in Barcelona of May 1937. The source of the Spanish anarchist betrayal is to be found in the bankruptcy of their ideology. Since, for anarchists, the state is not a class organ, merely being Oppression or Evil Incarnate, there is no need to distinguish between the proletarian and the bourgeois state. Thus, finding themselves a mass movement imminently imperiled by fascism, the CNT anarchists sought to employ all the weapons of power they could lay their hands on, including the most concentrated weapon of power, the machinery of state. But they did not try to create such a political weapon in a new proletarian form, but simply fell back upon its existing bourgeois form and joined the capitalist government. Unlike the anarchist betrayers, the Trotskyists, then as now, fought for the political independence of the working class and stood with the heroic workers of Barcelona.

Comfortably ensconced in the hall of U of T, the TAL may dream its sweet dreams of a socialist future. Big deal. Anarchism in practice can only mean betrayal. Only the program of revolutionary Trotskyism can make the dream of socialism a reality.

Joke degrading

I would like to congratulate the University of Toronto Medical Society for the brilliant success of the show "Daffydil 78" at the Hart House Theatre on March 18, 1978.

I must admit that the sketches were funny and the talented singers and dancers gave an excellent performance. However, I was upset by the costume worn by Mr. J. Patcai who acted as Won Ton Wang in the Act of Meds Admission Pageant. In the act, Mr. Patcai was dressed as a coolie with a pigtail underneath his bamboo hat and a strange sword around his waist. I ask is this the true image of a Chinese Canadian today? I am fully aware that it is only a joke: a degrading one. I regret to state that the image of stereotyped Chinese coolie with pigtail, rooted in some unenlightened Westerner's mind, is unacceptable to the Chinese Canadian community here. I would like to see Chinese Canadians portrayed in a more realistic and positive way in future shows. Is that too much to ask?

Trudeau government that issued the "Green Paper" on Immigration which blamed the immigrants for various social problems in Toronto and tried to whip up racial hysteria against the national minority communities? Far from seeking to call off these attacks, this same state has now taken measures to step up this campaign by passing the anti-immigrant Bill C-24 to further terrorize the immigrant communities. At the same time, the police themselves engage in physical racist attacks on the East Indian and West Indian communities, actively encouraging racist gangs to launch brutal assaults and defending the racists when the people fight back. The Immigration Department, too, is notorious for its harassment and persecution of immigrants of Asia, Africa and Latin America.

Spence points to the "infiltration of the Western Guard" by the RCMP "to secure incriminating evidence against its leadership."

What this amounts to was an RCMP agent carrying out over 200 racist attacks in Toronto and becoming a cell leader in this fascist organization. The "punishment" of the leadership of the Western Guard, for crimes for which ample evidence was available regardless of the assistance provided by the RCMP in carrying out racist attacks, amounted to a bare 2 years imprisonment.

The Canadian people are not racist. It is only in the interests of the rich minority to force immigrant workers to submit to the most vicious exploitation and repression, and to divide the people along race lines, not the ordinary people.

Fired Grad Post editor

Horvath gives her viewpoint

By GEORGE COOK

Two weeks ago, one day before a General Council meeting of the Graduate Students' Union (GSU), Maria Horvath, then editor of the Grad Post, was fired by the GSU executive.

Horvath, who has been fighting for reinstatement and an independent student newspaper for graduate students was asked by The Varsity for her observations on the events leading to her dismissal and the impending election.

"One thing that can be learned from the Grad Post affair is that (Leo) Casey (GSU member and presidential candidate in the upcoming elections) and the members of this year's executive are in no way democratic. The way they handled my firing clearly indicates this. They prevented any public discussion of my impending firing by saying that it was confidential under the law. That wasn't true — it wasn't confidential under law — and I pointed that out very clearly."

"MISHANDLED BOOKS"

"They've made allegations that I've mishandled the books, but at the same time they delayed by two months giving the Grad Post its second instalment and then paid me only 61 per cent of that instalment so I couldn't pay the bills."

"One way of taking over a paper, one way of harassing an editor, is not to give the paper money, and then to charge me with not paying my bills on time on the one hand, and on the other not giving me the money to pay the bills; that's out-and-out harassment."

At the general council meeting on March 23 Casey and his running mate, Alex Wilson, voted against a motion calling for implementation of all the recommendations of an investigation commission called by the Canadian University Press (CUP), a university press organization established to protect papers from student unions.

This motion would have reinstated Horvath.

A subsequent motion, however, moved by Wilson and seconded by Casey, called for implementation of most of the same recommendations.

Asked why she thought the two reversed their position at the meeting, Horvath said: "I think it was pure political expediency. It makes them look good, it makes them look like they're in favor of freedom of the press, which they aren't. Both of those people voted against my reinstatement despite the fact the (Canadian University Press) CUP investigation maintained there were no grounds for dismissal."

"Firing me meant, in effect, closing down the paper. Both of them knew elections were coming up within two weeks and it looks good on paper that they passed those motions. But the motion was meaningless. As Susan Johnson, the president of CUP, pointed out, there is no Grad Post now and whatever they print will be a 'house organ.'"

"Their actions show they (Casey and the GSU executive) consider themselves to have executive privileges, and I think that's a very terrifying concept which I thought had gone out with the Nixon years."

Casey and Wilson are being opposed by the Coalition for a Democratic GSU.

"I've given a very strong endorsement to the coalition," Horvath said. "They have a very strong commitment to a democratic executive. For example, both Tom Kuhn and Barb Stewart fought inside GSU council for responsible government and democratic executive."

"Leo Casey is running on the stand that he's very progressive and that he is very pro-union. The Grad Post affair shows he is neither of those things. He was eager to pit union member against member and he actually solicited or tried to solicit information from my co-workers, my fellow union members, to be used against me."

Horvath's union is prepared to take her case to arbitration.

"I'll win the arbitration," she said. "Indications are very strong that I'll win, and then I'll be reinstated. I truly believe that I won at the general council meeting — two thirds of council voted with me. If the GSU executive hadn't voted in their own interest, their own vested interest, then I would have been reinstated."

Library fears book fund cuts

By JOHN D'ANGELO

In reaction to the severe financial restrictions currently facing the U of T library system, the General Review Subcommittee of the U of T Library System is urging a "commitment on the part of the university to maintain the real value of the book acquisition fund."

The subcommittee's report, tabled last Thursday, suggested that book acquisition expenditures be tied to the rising price indices of books and periodicals. The appeal is one of six austere recommendations drafted by the subcommittee to be forwarded to the Academic Affairs Committee of Governing Council.

Robert Blackburn, Chief Librarian, supported the recommendation, remarking that his office had received many letters in favor of not letting the book budget slip any further. In preparing next year's budget proposal, to be approved in August, Blackburn said he directed an infusion of some $400,000 into the book fund while the library budget suffers an overall cut in the library budget of 3 per cent (about $357,000).

Attempting to stem this current "crisis" of a 3 per cent budget cutback, while book prices rise at a rate of some 12 per cent and periodical subscriptions at 16 per cent, the subcommittee further proposed that priorities within serial budgets be established in the event that cancellations are required, that the effectiveness of the current book ordering system be investigated, and that the effectiveness of the university's short term loan systems be evaluated (especially in view of the elimination of most of the duplicate text orders).

Regarding serial subscription policy, David Esplin, Associate Librarian in Charge of Acquisitions, commented that "the present budget is an accretion of decisions made over the last 80 to 90 years and has never undergone serious review ... a complete and comprehensive overhaul of subscriptions is needed."

Professor Frank Watts, member of the subcommittee, expressed bemusement in discovering that some departments such as sciences were able to prioritize their serial subscriptions with apparent certainty, while other department library committees, such as his own English department, found it

"virtually impossible" to list their serials in order of importance.

Communications between the Library Committee and university departments are still below expectations, according to committee members. Phil Ryan, Governing Council undergraduate representative and Chairman of the subcommittee, voiced concern that "we still are not certain of the value of many of the editions."

Professor R. B. Land, the third member of the subcommittee, stated that "we have to get more information from the science departments as to which books can be eliminated."

The frustrations and inefficiencies of the cutback procedures were brought to a head at the meeting when Professor J. A. Hellebust of the Botany Department Library Committee, speaking from the gallery, complained that "the book fund right now is not defended strongly enough by anybody."

The general consensus of the Library Committee was strongly in favor of pushing for a protection of the book funds, at the unavoidable expense of other facets of university facilities.

The Chief speaks!

By NICK MAROTTA

The fear of Quebec separatism has been built up far beyond what is reasonable and responsible, said the old trouper John Diefenbaker. In a speech ringing overtones of nationalism, Diefenbaker addressed himself last night to the question of Canadian unity. Speaking to an overflow audience at Scarborough College, Diefenbaker lashed out at the ambiguity inherent in Quebec premier Rene Levesque's plans for Quebec separatism.

Levesque, argued Diefenbaker, is not sure what he plans for Quebec separatism. One day he espouses plans for separation and another day he probes sovereignty for the province of Quebec.

Levesque, however, will not succeed in attaining Quebec separatism, said Diefenbaker, for the simple reason that he has aroused Canadians. Canadians will respond to the challenge, and while they will be reasonable and responsible towards the issue of separatism, they will not be intimidated by idle threats.

The delicate question of Quebec's referendum will depend on the wording that will be used. Diefenbaker believes that Quebecers will not opt for separatism unless the question is posed in a manner that will disguise its true intent. However, this does not imply that Canadians should be complacent to the issue, said Diefenbaker. They must endeavor to attain a true equality of all Canadians.

There is a pressing and urgent need for Canadians to draw up a plan to combat the threat of the referendum, said Diefenbaker. He also pointed out the need for the individual Canadian to take up the challenge and to fight to preserve their country.

Diefenbaker concluded with a stirring laudation of Canada.

"I have devoted my life to bringing about one Canada one nation. My goal is to do my part in building the Canada of my dreams and the Canada of my expectations. This is my country. This is your country. Will you do your part to ensure that the country will survive?"

Women protest a bad deal

By ROBERTA CLARE

The policies of the Ministries of Colleges and Universities and Social Services came under severe attack yesterday as an informal coalition of women's rights groups confronted John Bonner, assistant to Harry Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities, and Nadine Shpikula, representative of the Social Services Benefits Branch.

Among the women's organizations represented at the meeting in Government offices at Queen's Park were the ERA of Women Society at Ryerson Polytechnical Institute, the Association of Single Parents at U of T and Ryerson, the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS), U of T SAC Women's Commission, The Awake Program, Atkinson College, York University, and Black Women For Wages For Housework.

The coalition presented their grievances about the provincial educational policies and expressed particular concern about the Ontario Study Grant Program (OSGP) and its effects on welfare mothers, black and immigrant women and single women across the province. The women identified themselves as representatives of a group in society which traditionally has not had access to post-secondary education, "the 70 per cent which Dr. Parrott has recently expressed concern about."

Among the nine barriers facing women students receiving Family Benefits Aid (FBA) or Family Welfare Aid (FWA) are inadequate funding, poor opportunities for part-time employment, domestic dependence, according to Mary Zedlin, president of the ERA Women Society and director of Women's Affairs at Ryerson.

Nancy Duffy, a member of the Association of Student Single Parents at Ryerson, presented the demands of the coalition: lifting the dependent category and time limit in the eligibility period for grants; an increase in grants to cover the cost of living and the high unemployment rate; and a "full grant covering all costs for all students, full and part-time, which is a wage in recognition of the work involved in our training."

The coalition asked for clarification of the present OSAP, OSGP and Special Bursary FWA programs. "Workers from the FWA and the GWA (General Welfare Aid) are either not informed or have chosen not to relate the information" to the welfare recipients, Peggy Reinhardt of The Awake Program, Atkinson College, charged.

The coalition called for the updating of Government booklets. Shpikula admitted that the Social Services information guide, "Your Families Benefits" has not been revised since 1975. The group asked that a revised edition be distributed to all welfare families informing them of the options available for post-secondary financial assistance.

Marx course dropped

By ADAM KNELMAN-OSTRY

A course on Marxian economics originally considered for the fall term had to be scrapped because of internal problems and financial restrictions, according to Political Economy department chairman Ian Drummond.

"The Committee on Economics was exploring the possibility of introducing the course and contacted the Graduate Student's Union to find an instructor for it. Once we got our budget in, problems arose so we decided not to go ahead with it. Instead, we felt that the money would be put to better use if it went towards our tutorial program," Drummond said.

Drummond stated that tutorials are already suffering but that a better allocation of funds would help maintain a program meeting the required needs.

Drummond went on to explain that over the past two years, the History of Economic Thought (ECO 322) course had evolved in such a way that now close to a third of the time was devoted to Marx. He stated that "as of next year, ECO 322 would be described in the calendar as the History of Economic Thought, Smith to Marx." However, Drummond said that at some future date, he would like to see a course devoted to post-Marxian economics incorporated into the program.

Another economics professor stated that there were new courses on Canadian economic policy which, although not having been officially considered, should have been offered but won't be for lack of funds. Drummond stated that the department "had received an across-the-board decrease in funding. I find it very discouraging that we can't expand our curriculum but at this time it is simply impossible to do so with our present funding being what it is."

New team at SAC

By GEORGE COOK

"You don't have time to play partisan political games." Those were among the last words of retiring Students' Administrative Council (SAC) president John Tuzyk, who handed the office to Brian Hill last Wednesday evening. Tuzyk spoke to a joint meeting of the old and new councils in the chambers of the Governing Council.

"The quality of education is being seriously threatened," he said. "I hope that is the issue you address yourselves to next year." After Tuzyk spoke other members of the old executive gave their year-end reports.

John Doherty, outgoing External Commissioner, said he believed the March 16 anti-cutbacks demonstration would come to nothing unless further work is done next year to counter the provincial government cutbacks in education spending.

"We need active political action on campus, with community work and trade union support," Doherty stated.

When reports from the old executive were over the new board of directors took over and proceeded with the election of a new executive.

Doherty, an Erindale College student nominated Danny Gogek, also from Erindale, for the position of Finance Commissioner.

After three ballots Gogek defeated Carl Symondson (Law) and Jane Bowiby (St. Hilda's).

The Communications Commission will be handled by Chris du Vernet (Trinity), a former features editor of The Varsity.

The Education Commission went to Susanna Kelly (St. Mikes) and University Government remained firmly in the grasp of Brian O'Riordan, also from St. Mikes.

The External Commission passed from Doherty to Mike Wernick and Services remained with Phil de Groot.

Kate Bishop (Innis) will be next year's Women's Commissioner.

With a few minor amendments the new board approved a scaled-down operating budget from 1978-79. Next year, barring a fee increase, SAC will spend $336,000.00.

French department hit harder

By NICK MAROTTA
The logistics of the situation dictate that U of T's French Department will have to absorb a higher cutback than that of most departments, according to Arthur Kruger, dean of the Faculty of Arts and Science.

Kruger addressed the department's faculty, teaching assistants and staff in a meeting Friday in which he outlined the various factors contributing to the French department's being assessed for a cutback estimated at 5.7 per cent.

The drop in enrolment for the Faculty of Arts and Science is one of the factors which Kruger maintained have a role in creating budgetary difficulties.

According to Kruger, enrolment in the faculty has decreased from 10,300 to approximately 9,600. This decline has had an adverse effect on the university's budget by reducing its income, he said.

Kruger suggested a few possible solutions for the dwindling enrolment. He said the admission standard could be lowered to 65-67 per cent. However the suggestion was unanimously rejected on the grounds that if the downtown standard were lowered, there would be a larger influx of students to the St. George campus with a subsequent decrease enrolment at Scarborough and Erindale colleges.

Kruger presented his explanation of why the French department should absorb a higher cutback. He pointed out that although Government funding is at 5.8 per cent and university expenditures have stayed at 15 per cent, salaries have risen by 3.75. The university's income which is derived from tuition fees is 4.6 to 4.8 per cent. Thus the budget indicates a 3 per cent advantage should be imposed on all departments. Some departments will however, be hit harder than others.

Kruger said that several factors, such as the tenured staff in some departments as high as 100 per cent, and a low support staff make these departments unlikely candidates to absorb a high cutback.

Those at the meeting found this explanation difficult to accept. Some participants were vociferous in their opinion that at a time when the university president is actively campaigning on the issue of national unity the French department shouldn't be assessed at high cutback.

Liberal nomination

Votes for sale in Rosedale

By BLAIR HUNTER

The sale of riding association memberships has drawn heavy flak in the closing days of the nomination race for the Liberal candidacy in the federal riding of Rosedale. Regardless of who wins the nomination — retiring U of T president John Evans or Ann Cools — the publicity surrounding the campaign has laid bare the true nature of the nomination process.

The rules of the Liberal Party state that for every three memberships to the Rosedale riding association sold, a candidate may sell one membership to an individual outside the riding. The candidate with the greatest number of memberships sold is most likely to win the nomination at tomorrow's riding convention at the Sheraton Centre.

The deadline for the sale of riding memberships was 8 p.m. Monday and both candidates labored down to the wire to capture as many prospective votes as possible.

Evans was reluctant to state how many out-of-riding memberships he has sold. Cools said that after she had sold 150 out-of-riding memberships she was not actively pursuing the drive any further.

"THE ROSEDALE HUSTLE"

The Globe and Mail in an editorial entitled "The Rosedale Hustle" (March 29) damned the "procedural hodge-podge" in which "... the core of hard-working association members who have supported the party in past years ... find themselves outnumbered by a last-minute surge of instant members."

In reaction to The Globe editorial Evans expressed his surprise stating, "The exercise of the democratic process is to stimulate interest amongst all people within the riding."

Evans added, "The important thing is that people from all background and ages are participating. I have tried to reach a complete cross-section of residents through the sale of riding memberships."

Cools who is presently Executive Director of Women In Transition, a United Way member agency, disapproved of The Globe editorial.

A campaign-weary Cools said Monday evening in a telephone interview, "While the nomination process is vulnerable to many variables — money, machinations, prestige and favors owed and favors due — we never entered the race to play a purely numbers game."

"The essence of my candidacy has been to bring the nomination process back to the constituency and return a basic democratic sense to this process," said Cools.

The Globe editorial concluded that, "The democratic nature of ridings such as Rosedale has been replaced by a scavenger hunt ... If the national parties cannot establish policies to restore the balance, it is up to the Federal Government ... to introduce legislation to do the job."

Survival handbook for new students

By BILL CRANGLE

The Department of Alumni Affairs (DAA) is taking a new role in the day-to-day concerns of the average student on campus.

In addition to their traditional function of helping the community realize the value of financial contributions to higher education, the DAA's recently formed Student Liaison Committee, chaired by Toronto School Board social worker Anne Marie Nosal, has instituted several programs of value to students.

Their annual meeting at Innis College last Thursday began with the distribution of a new Student-Alumni Relations Handbook, to help the widely disparate members of this committee work together.

Nosal insists this committee will be different from most: "We have a tradition of perpetuating committees — call one for half an hour, and six months later it's still meeting once a month, spending half its time deciding when to call the next meeting."

So far, the committee has arranged for the publication in April of a survival guide for students new to Toronto. It was produced by two students on a L.I.P. grant under the aegis of the Ministry of Culture and Recreation.

The DAA is also expanding its counselling service, through which a student can seek help from an old graduate experienced in his field. In addition to this, the "old boy network" is being given a bit more organization, to help more U of T students get jobs when they leave.

It takes more than theory to start a practice.

When I was a kid, I wanted to grow and be Review Editor. Then I realised that I couldn't do both.

On the glorious occasion of the year's last Review, I would like to thank all those who wrote for the Review, my sub-editors, and very special thanks to those who came back week after week and put up with my latent (?) fascist tendencies, in order to work on production: Arthur, B. Who says that Canadian Composers aren't a fashionable, dynamic young group? Here we see Tali Kenins in a rare and candid shot without his '57 Pontiac Firechief. Note boffo 'doo and natty threads. Turn to pages 18 and 19 for a triple scoop of Canuck tunesmiths.

Here we see famous fascist mystic Herr N. Aid actually levitating his own hand. In a prepared speech he denied that he used a cattle prod on his own body to achieve this effect, saying that he uses positive re-enforcement, treating his hands to the occasional milk bone. Flick over to page 23 for the digital details on Mr. Aid and one of his friends, Jack Spratt.

Here we see Steve Petranik, this year's Review Editor, at the end of his term and his rope. A spy twenty when he first took the job, the toll and pressure of the position and his constant tending off of the socialist wolf at the door has taken its toll in the form of galloping consumption. Here we see him with his electric bonnet and chin warmer trying not to have a painful discharge. We'll visit you Steve. Maybe.

"when i see poetry like this , i know i don't like poetry like this"

I've always been a philistine. Somewhere there's a block which prevents a true appreciation of the subtlety and feeling which is transformed through the soul of the artist into great art. The tender agonies and the final achievement of translation onto paper and canvas escape the narrow field of my beady eyes.

This is particularly true when applied to the outpourings of the unknown. It's much easier to understand the greatness of a work of art when someone in authority is there telling you that it's great, just as it's easier to find a bar with a neon sign. On the other hand it is the task of the critic to discern important works of art as they are created. If you do you can become famous as a discoverer and a patron saint of the struggling artist.

Applying this precept to the campus literary reviews, which spring up at this season is, unfortunately, difficult. The primary function of these productions seems to be to provide a forum for the confessions and ego-editing necessary to the success of a man or woman at this university. To publish a poem or a story is a classier form of confession than spilling your guts in the nearby coffee-shop.

At the moment at least four of these productions are available for those who seek them: The University of Toronto Review, Acta Victoriana, The Trinity University Review, and Grammaton (from St. Mike's). The first three are classy Coach House Press productions with photographs, ritzy layout and lots of white space to set off the cries of the heart. Grammaton is run on a smaller budget and is mimeographed. This must be a dagger in the heart of most of those who have been published there.

Of the expensive productions Acta wins the award. The U of T Review's notebook format seems inconducive to the placement of poetry.

Single short poems sit high and lonely on large pages and are dwarfed. In the prose pieces there is simply too much print on a page. The Trinity Review's graphics are weak at best and their sans serif typeface is a ticket to migraines. Acta, with its 7 by 9 horizontal format, is readable, compact, and the production is highlighted by quality photographs and graphics (Bryan Collieran's prize-winning photograph should afford many hours of guessing exactly what is in the background).

Unfortunately Acta's content is not on the same level. And the editors have chosen to amplify the problem by the addition of many poems by alumni heavies such as Margaret Atwood, Dennis Lee and Grace Irwin. Vic students seem more interested in formal verse than others on campus and for the most part write adequate rump-te-bump doggerel. When they do move into freer forms (as in David Knight's "Post-Cardiac Interview") the familiar spondeeic wash of nouns and adjectives without connection or rational order takes place. It makes one wish that poets would read their verse aloud once in a while. The rhythms of the spoken word may be over-rated but they do allow reader access to the poet's language.

At Trinity, the most cliquish of the Reviews (all of the editors print their own productions) we encounter a great deal of confessional 'you did this to me with razor blades' poetry, a 'fugitive essay from 1967 on hallucinogens, and some formless stories which change focus or even narrative form in mid-stream for no reason. John Ibbittson's "Customer Service" is cute but overlong, and I'm told that David Goodwin's "Women of Lemnos" is better than the derivative Milton meets C. P. Cavafy I think it is. Otherwise 'Ugh!!!'

Surprisingly the best single poem I've seen published this year is in that ragged step-child Grammaton. "After Neruda" by D. J. Daly, may be a translation; but I hope not. Everyone who writes poetry at this University should read it and watch tact, wit, and intelligence work together. The middle of the poem bogs a bit in the direction of abstract word-blather but the final lines deserve quotation:

Now the sun;
And you wake me, impatient
As an amperсанд, no time
For any letters, just
A quick-looped scrawl to me:

& what now & what next & what then?

In the prose department, weaker than is usual this year, only Rose Eng's "The Tenant" in The U of T Review displays the attention to craft necessary to the construction of a successful story. Unlike most of the stories published this year it does not strive for the frisson value of the boffo epiphany, a tactic which usually mishaps the work as a whole. Eng has the advantage of a longer space (being an editor has its compensations) but she seems to be the only prose writer published this year who has the technical control to handle additional length. "The Tenant" is scarcely ambitious, and one suspects that the tension between social realism and whimsy might wear in a collection of stories. In isolation, however, it is a success, and in the context of this year the only one.

The general situation is not encouraging. If these are our young writers perhaps we should begin to worship the old. (In parenthetical conclusion, I'd like to award the Specious Bad Taste medal to the U of T Review for that hideous Buddha on page 35. No one else, this year, has fallen nearly so low. Congrats gang, you've set quite a standard.)

New Big Sleep just like death

Remaking a film classic is like using rat poison as chip-dip. No one but a suicidal maniac could possibly take on the burden of improving a great film. King Kong was a disaster. A Star is Born was slightly better, but only because the original was something less than great.

The Bogart-Bacall version of The Big Sleep is probably the best detective film ever made. There are competitors but with its stream-lines directing, superb acting (any film with the immortal Elisha Cook Jr. has to be a classic) and Bill Faulkner's superbly twisted reading of Raymond Chandler's murky plot, the original achieves a power which is unmatched.

Had Michael Winner's new version outdone the original the effect would have been of transcendence. Watching such a film would have been a flash-forward to heaven; the popcorn vendors would have been archangels.

Needless to say this has not occurred. Winner has attempted to divorce his film entirely from the Bogart version by moving it from Los Angeles to London, from 1940 to 1978. Robert Mitchum made a creditable Marlowe in Farewell My Lovely and does so again here, and his portrayal of Chandler's detective is strong enough to quiet Bogart's ghost. Sarah Miles seems to have been cast because she bears no resemblance whatever to Lauren Bacall, in appearance, or, sadly, in talent. Anything which might call to mind the original has been carefully excised.

It's a brave attempt but it's not worth the trouble. Chandler's story is not deep enough to allow more than one great reading. Winner's major innovations have been to unclutter the plot line (we discover, for instance, how it is that Owen Taylor died) and to coarsen the Lauren Bacall character. In a sense this is more faithful to Chandler whose misogyny is acute to the point of pain. On the other hand placing Marlowe into an entirely corrupt universe serves to exacerbate the morbid sentimentality inherent in Chandler's story. Marlowe is the lost, anachronistic but entirely heroic crusader in Chandler, a potent enough figure one supposes but the heaviness of Chandler's hand galls. No one, we want to scream, is as good as that.

Bogart managed to mute this aspect of Marlowe's character, and the corrupt but sympathetic Bacall figure validated the environment. Chandler's cartoons had become people and the morality play has turned to realism. Winner has reversed this movement and it doesn't wash. The corrupt figures are not strong enough to convince us. Chandler's concept of sin is too sophomoric to be played straight, particularly when it is set into 1978 without allowances for the changes in conventional morality. The original film fudged the exact nature of the corruption. And pornography, drug addiction and homicidal nymphomanias were more potent signs of personal degradation in 1940 than they are now. In playing all of these vices full-front Winner has trivialized Marlowe's final condemnation of the society.

The acting and the pacing of the film are almost uniformly terrible. Mitchum is as good as can be expected under the circumstance, but the rest of the cast seems to be fighting off the allure of catalepsy. And some of the editing would make a Grade 10 film education student wince.

There is still a power in the film. As bad as it is the viewer emerges from the theatre somewhat scathed. Chandler's intuition of evil is so close to right that even his cliched exempla for it have a strength which resists being treated as cartooned villainy. In The Big Sleep we are closer to the root than we are in any of the demon-flicks which draw the line-ups with promises of Hell. On that alone the film survives even a debased treatment like this one.

Composers at U of T's Faculty of Music

Compose. Componere. To put together. "A composer is anyone who produces a new song," writes the theorist Tintoris in 1477. But surely there's more to being a composer than just putting together "new" material. What about all those 19th-century melomaniacs? Beethoven and his temper tantrums? Bach with his twenty children? Ah, the era of the misunderstood pauper composer is no more; indeed, today's composer may still be misunderstood, but if you look right on your doorstep — just over at the University's Faculty of Music — you won't find any unemptied chamber-pots stashed under the pianos, neither will you be beset by haggard hummers in desperate search of pencil and manuscript-paper.

The department of composition, like the Faculty itself, is well into its third decade, although theory and composition were taught in grand old Oxbridge style during the golden years of the Royal Conservatory of Music by such legendary grands maitres as Healey William, Sir Ernest MacMillan and Leo Smith. In 1952, the Conservatory and the Faculty joined forces as part of the University, and a department of theory and composition was formed, comprising composers Godfrey Ridout, a pupil of Willan, Oscar Morawetz, originally from Czechoslovakia, and John Winzweig, who eventually became the granddaddy of dodecaphonic music in Canada. To this embryonic triumvirate came two additional members, Talivaldis Kenins and John Beckwith in the following year, and a program offering an artist diploma in composition began to roll forward. With these five composers, the Faculty established a happy balance of European and home-grown elements. During the '50's, the department was dominated by John Weinzweig, who taught composers such as Harry Somers, Harry Freedman and Murray Schafer.

Plans for an electronic music studio began in the late 1950's, but it was not established until the move from the old building at College and University to the new Edward Johnson Building was completed in 1962. The year 1964 saw the emancipation of the composition course into a degree program, and also the arrival of American electronic music specialist Gustave Ciamaga, now serving as Acting Dean of the Faculty of Music.

In the late sixties, as the department grew, several new staff-members were added — the German-trained Lothar Klein, Derek Holman, and graduates John Hawkins and Edward Laufer. Currently the department boasts some 13 members, all of whom assume a variety of teaching duties, from theory and keyboard harmony to composition classes of three to four students. Two composers are currently on sabbatical: John Hawkins in New York, and former Dean Beckwith in the wilds of New Zealand.

We might also add that one need not be a member of the Theory and Composition department in order to be a composer. Various members of the History and Literature department for instance were composers in their younger days, notably Robert Falk, who experimented with electronic music, and various others whose efforts, while difficult to trace, form the basis of interesting rumour.

All in all an interesting group of people, and already there is a "new layer" of Toronto-based composers, all graduates of the Faculty, including 'Array' composers John Fodi, Marjan Mozetich, Elma Miller, and Thomas Dusato. D.D.

Walter Buczynski

Walter Buczynski is a lot like his music. Clever, direct, often funny — and always honest. One of the "homegrown" set of composers, most of them now between the ages of forty and fifty, Buczynski studied at the Royal Conservatory and then later with Darius Milhaud in Aspen, Colorado, and Nadia Boulanger in Paris. Neither Boulanger nor Milhaud inculcated any strong new values into the mind of the young composer — the latter evidently looked on approvingly most of the time, and Boulanger "taught me how to criticize myself. I would take in a composition to her, and she would listen to it, explaining where she thought it needed to be balanced, to have something more. But she wouldn't tell you what to do. You had to sit and figure it out yourself. And of course it would finally come out right."

Buczynski is a "Canadian" composer insofar as he feels himself part-and-parcel of Canadian life. "I grew up with hotdogs, hamburgers and hockey, but it's not important that I be considered a "Canadian" composer. You know, Aaron Copland was a very good composer before he became an American composer. I suppose we're all less inhibited now by European figures like Stockhausen and Boulez — we can come out on our own now."

There is a keen eye for anything fake or pretentious. "During the sixties every gesture was untravelling — if it was legitimate, it has stayed." One of Buczynski's compositions is a satire on Murray Schafer's From the Tibetan Book of the Dead. The satire is called From the Buczynski Book of the Living, and contains a scene with an opera singer dying. Only she gets stronger, and the scene goes on, and she doesn't die.

Like any composer worth his salt, Buczynski already can divide his compositional career into three style periods. The first, extending from 1962-1968 comprised mostly serial music, "and in 1969 until about 1973 I entered a more theatrical phase. You know, a performer can give a concert, the audience applauds, and then he walks out the back door without knowing what the audience really thought of the whole thing. So in a way my theatricality was a reaction against the passivity of audiences. Turn around and stick your tongue out at them — aha, you'll get a reaction." Concert theatre pieces are passe: "You have to go the whole way, like opera, to make it work."

Since 1973 Buczynski has entered a more lyrical phase. "My stages in composition really reveal my stages of personality. A composer always reveals his neuroses in his writing. My early work was very angular, angry. Now it has completely changed. I'm not so concerned now with making a statement — I make a gesture instead. It works."

Buczynski currently teaches — "I love it" — and composes regularly. Commissions help. And until recently he was a performer as well. Why stop performing? "I found that nobody else would perform my works, simply because I had either performed or recorded it. I suppose they didn't want to provide an alternative to — well, I guess you'd call it the definitive version."

Buczynski remains a staunch family man, and to a certain extent it has influenced his life as a composer. "If you have a family to support, you can't just fool around. And my kids are at the age where they ask questions constantly. I have some answers, but I tell them that it's important to come up with even more questions."

Robert Schumann once wrote: "If a composer holds a program up to us before his music, I say: 'Before all else let me hear that you have made beautiful music'; afterwards I can also find your program pleasant." Buczynski expresses much the same opinion when he says "I don't care what anybody else is writing, as long as it has beauty. Because after all that really is the common bond among us all, isn't it?"

T.V.

Gustav Ciamaga

Gustav Ciamaga, currently Acting Dean of the Faculty of Music, is our resident electronic music specialist and he is largely responsible for establishing U of T's electronic music studio as one of the finest on the continent. However, he's also an ardent Gershwin promoter and has produced a relatively large number of articles and papers, mostly connected with audioengineering. Little wonder he is hesitant to admit a strong affiliation with any one particular field, for as he has said: "I'm a firm believer that if you take on a label — composer or pianist or musicologist or what have you, that you really have to work at it. But I'm one of those people who sit in one area for a while, then move on to another area, and another."

Ciamaga hails from London, Ontario, where he studied violin and piano. After some stints as an arranger for bands and as a jazz pianist, he took up music seriously at University of Western Ontario and then U of T, studying with John Beckwith and John Weinzweig. The major turning point in his career came during his graduate studies with the neo-classical trio at Brandeis U., Arthur Berger, Harold Shapero and Irving Fine. Strangely enough, it was here that he was first directed to electronic music, which he claims was an immediate "love affair" and led him to establish the electronic music studio at Brandeis.

While at Brandeis, he met up with a fellow Canadian, Hugh LeCaine, and between them they produced the Serial Structure Generator (SSG), a non-computer programming device.

The SSG allowed some variety in early electronic music by using multiple sequencers to produce changeable combinations of pitch, duration, intensity and timbre. Since all but this last parameter are much the same in 'traditional' Western music and in electronic music, most of Ciamaga's efforts, especially in his two-part inventions, have been aimed towards refining the timbral effects available to the composer. This experimentation is further guided by a desire to help codify the electronic musician's vocabulary so that these techniques might be more accurately transmitted to student composers in the field.

Not all Ciamaga's compositions are electronic. One notable exception is Solipsism (1972) for flute, voice, piano and tape, which is based on a Margaret Atwood text. In fact, the majority of his electronic works were produced in the '60's, while the current decade seems to be characterized more by word-writing. One of his two-part inventions has been recorded, however, and is available at the Faculty of Music Library.

Working within a university framework is almost essential for the electronic composer (unless you happen to be independently wealthy) for it provides the necessary facilities. Since his arrival at U of T in 1963, however, Ciamaga has not remained hidden away in the basement studio. He became Chairman of the Theory and Composition Department in 1968 and last year was appointed Acting Dean. No doubt, administrative headaches have left him little free time for composing and, given his past 'free-roaming' record, who knows what he'll turn his hand to next?

M.J.K.

Derek Holmes

Born in the British Isles, Dr. Holman emigrated to Canada in 1965 to join the U of T teaching staff. Prior to that date, he had held a variety of church-related positions, including that of music master at the Westminster Abbey Choir School and assistant organist at St. Paul's Cathedral. In addition to his present university duties, he also attends to the musical needs at Grace Church-on-the-Hill and, consequently, the majority of his compositions are choral works.

Holman's attitude towards composing is unusual. "First of all, I have never considered myself a composer. 'General practitioner' would more accurately describe my musical endeavours, since I compose, perform, conduct, or teach as the need arises. Quite honestly, my major source of inspiration lies in specific commissions and I'm happiest when placing that double bar line at the end of a work. Writing music is, for me, very hard work."

"All my music is written to be performed. It is infinitely more satisfying to me to write, say, a descant for the boys' choir at Grace Church or to arrange a set of Christmas carols for a performance at the National Arts Centre, than to compose a piece which would never get beyond its 'world premiere'."

Not all his commissions come from churches. Most recently, I have completed a suite of Canadian folk songs arranged for the Galliard Ensemble. Of the compositions of mine which have been sung by the Festival Singers, the most successful has been one of my carols, "Make We Joy Now in This Fest". Perhaps the pieces about which I feel happiest are the cantatas that Robertson Davies and I put together for the 'Gaudey Night' celebrations at Massey College. "Homage to John Aubrey" (1975) was scored for the college choir and a group of Renaissance instrument enthusiasts at the college, while "Samuel Pepys and His Musik" (1976) used the available strings and percussion. With any luck, we'll collaborate on another one for this Christmas."

Prof. Holman doesn't find 'writing to order' a hamper on his personal musical expression. "I have never known an inspiration from heaven which couldn't be moulded to the resources at hand. As a matter of fact, the concept of composing music for anything other than some practical purpose is a relatively recent phenomenon. Bach, Haydn, Mozart — they all wrote as the occasion required."

Among the composers influential in his development, Prof. Holman numbers Vaughan Williams, Stravinsky, and Benjamin Britten. "Since many of the singers I deal with are amateurs, I'm always impressed by the superb craftsmanship shown by a composer such as Britten, who can write interesting and clever music, but always include discrete cues for the performers."

Does it ever disturb Holman that his music would be labelled conservative by today's standards? "Not in the least. Perhaps my exposure to pre-Twentieth-Century music, in performing and teaching, has made me somewhat narrow-minded and my style moderate when compared to other contemporary works, but the people for whom my work is intended often find it quite radical and demanding to perform. And, if you'll recall, performing is what my music is all about."

M.J.K.

Lothar Klein

Lothar Klein came to Toronto from the University of Texas. Though he was born in Germany, he matured in the Minneapolis area of the U.S. It was here that his early work was done. I asked him how he had begun to compose, and about the early works in his list of compositions. Most of them, he told me, were written for theatrical productions. He referred to this as "coming into composition by the back door." When I laughed at this remark he hastened to explain that he in no way meant to be pejorative concerning this type of writing. "In fact," he said, "it was good training in terms of a practical approach to musical composition."

In his classes he acquaints the students with the fact that in composing they are usually writing for a certain performing situation which must be taken into consideration. At the same time he hopes that his students (or students in general, for that matter) won't feel that they must adopt the most avant garde forms of contemporary musical expression as a sort of religious exercise at the shrine of Art, or as the "culmination of an historical imperative" as Klein expresses it. "Good music will make itself apparent regardless of the mode of expression."

One might add "regardless of the composer's source of material" to the last statement. As an example of these ideas, Klein's Musique a Go-Go is really a fine example. This work was commissioned by George Szell for the Cleveland Orchestra. It takes many of its ideas from the area of popular music of the time it was written, 1966, and transposes them into the orchestral milieu. Klein produced a virtuoso piece for orchestra, and at the same time demonstrated (he called it "nose-thumbing") that non-serious sources can be very handy. It also demonstrates Klein's considerable ability as an orchestrator.

Klein is fond of Stravinsky, and the strong rhythmic aspects of his compositions may perhaps be traced to this base. He describes himself as a free tonal composer, with some serial aspects to his work. Strictly serial techniques don't appeal to him strongly, mainly because it limits a certain amount of emotional expression. This, I think, ties in with Klein's view of practicality. "The audience," he says, "Must have something it can grasp." But then, the rational Prof. Klein said, "the terms 'avant garde' and 'conservative' have lost a lot of their meaning in a time when it is seemingly impossible to shock an audience." The temper of a time which engendered a riot at the first performance of The Rite of Spring is long gone, and perhaps it is a pity in some ways. It seems we have lost the limits which permit an artist to shock us.

These artistic boundaries seem attractive to Klein. When I asked him what his favourite compositions were among his own works, he at first said that it was like choosing a favourite child, but when he thought about it he mentioned the Paganini Collage for Violin and Orchestra and an arrangement of medieval airs for instrumental consort and orchestra. When we look at his list of compositions we see A la Rossini for oboe and piano, Three Ancient Folk Songs for Choir, and Eight Madrigals with texts from the Elizabethan poets. This seems surprising from a composer who has been written about in terms of "Varese-like percussion" and "dry sparse texture and fragmented phrases"; a composer who admits to being influenced by some Webern. But here again, in our discussion of artistic boundaries we find ourselves faced with overtones of the rationality of the composer. But in the case of Klein his approach, which allows him a freedom of choice, also allows him to choose the aspects of his craft which best serve his compositional purposes. It also accounts for the diversity found in his works, which seems in some ways to stem from the activity of an academic intellect.

Oskar Morawetz

Oskar Morawetz has been in Toronto since 1940, the year he fled his native Czechoslovakia. Among the most senior Faculty members, he has established a large catalogue of works, taken many awards and fellowships, and seen his compositions performed by important American and European orchestras. He is probably the most widely performed Canadian composer.

Morawetz considers himself a largely self-taught composer. He had little formal training as a composer in Europe, and began his music education as a pianist. "I was by the standards of any piano teacher a bad student. I was hungry for new scores; by age seventeen I had a good knowledge of some twenty-five operas, including Wagner. The business of repeating a piece until a teacher considered it perfect didn't interest me; I had no patience. Obviously I wasn't destined to be a performer."

Prof. Morawetz feels that too many students take the opposite attitude. "There are people here who are content to know ten or fifteen pieces perfectly, and it is almost impossible to change their ways. They may become reasonably good teachers, though often enough, even in our own Conservatory, they go on to teach the same pieces they learned as children. Generally I am much more interested in new works than new performances. I know the standard numbers so well that a bigger retard here or louder entry there is not very significant to me."

Morawetz rejects the academic excommunication of composers sometimes considered sentimental or unprogressive. "I don't see why I can't admire Bernstein and Gounod as well as Berg and Stravinsky. I feel strongly that Puccini was one of the most gifted opera composers of all time; it's no accident that after fifty years he continues to be performed

Morawetz applies this eclecticism to serial music as well. "Schoenberg, Webern and Berg are often put into the same basket because they were friends and all worked at the same time, but in my opinion Berg was a giant compared to the other two. You don't need a theoretical introduction to enjoy Berg. Schoenberg, while a great mind and a revolutionary, lacked, to use an unfashionable term, inspiration. People nowadays are carried away by the technical abilities of composers, just as in Beethoven's day Albrechtsberger and Fux were considered great because they new counterpoint so thoroughly."

Morawetz's own technique is formidable — he has written a passacaglia in the style of Bach which continues to be praised as a fine orchestration of that master — but his style is unique, personal, and very accessible. Along with From the Diary of Anne Frank for soprano and orchestra, his best remembered composition is the Memorial to Martin Luther King, a tone poem for cello and orchestra based on the events surrounding King's death.

The King project in a sense began before the assassination. In 1967, Rostropovich asked Morawetz to write something different for cello, claiming to "have enough concertos". A few sketches were started without success. "I didn't know much about him before it happened, but I learned a great deal in the next few days from T.V. specials. I think it was during the coverage of his burial when I saw the words of his favourite spiritual, 'Free at Last', inscribed on his tombstone, that I thought of writing a funeral march using that spiritual."

Illness prevented Rostropovich from premiering the work in 1973, but it has been recorded very successfully by Zara Nelsova and the Toronto Symphony.

A.K.

Talivaldis Kenins

A long-time resident at the Faculty of Music, Talivaldis Kenins is a member of the European-trained "old guard" in the composition department. Studies with Joseph Wihlton in Riga, at the Latvian State Conservatory were followed by six years in Paris, until 1950. Details of his Parisian existence, playing in cafes while studying at the Conservatoire, seem to be the stuff that a composer's life ought to be made of, although Kenins doesn't make any mention of garrets and cockroaches. His teacher in Paris, Tony Aubin, was himself a pupil of Paul Dukas, and Kenins stresses the precision he learned from the French style. "I also learned the difference between approaching a discipline and a style. Writing modal counterpoint — that is a discipline, and you look at it differently than you would your own composition."

Kenins can cite an impressive list of associates during his Paris years. Not only that, his own career there was successful, walking away as he did with the Premier Prix from the Conservatoire for a sonata for cello and piano. Messiaen was another respected teacher. "I appreciated most his analytical mind, his understanding of the rapport between music and art, and most of all his exploration of rhythm. Of course his study of non-Western music reflects this interest."

One of his classmates at the Conservatoire happened to be French composer Pierre Boulez. "He would always do what he wanted, and didn't care what the others thought. In fact, he'd tell you so in no uncertain terms!" Kenins stresses his own openness to new techniques, and the importance of communicating them to students. "Even if I don't use a certain technique, I think it's important that my students become aware of it and try it out. There is such a diversity of technique now — even composers such as Stravinsky and Berio changed drastically within their lifetimes because there was so much possibility for change. The same is even more true today."

As for Canadian music, "Schafer and Serge Garant seem to hold the view that music depends on the social environment. This is partly so, but I think much more relies on the communication between composers of different countries — now it's so much faster and more urgent."

Kenins is quite candid about European music today. "Stockhausen was the first to find a gadget, a device, a new idea. I saw a performance of one of his most recent works in Aix-en-Provence — you know, it really wasn't such a far cry from Monteverdi, with sprechstimme, arias and everything!"

Kenins meanwhile boasts an impressive list of compositions, many recorded. The symphonies, mostly written for commissions, number five, and Kenins states a preference for writing chamber music. The "French influence" reigns supreme in the general tonal idiom of the works, their abundance of imitative writing and so on, but Kenins has also experimented with serial music. Not an innovative composer, to be sure, but definitely an honest and decidedly musical one.

Godfrey Ridout

Godfrey Ridout is a raconteur, and like any good story-teller, he is an animated person. Anecdotes, which flow in profusion, are for all intents dramatized in front of the listener. This, of course, is a particularly vivid way of making one's point, and when Ridout is fond of a certain work, a composer, or musician, you are sure to know it. "My God it was good!" usually said as he raises his arms over his head for emphasis.

Professor Ridout is a member of the Dept. of History and Literature of the Faculty of Music, but at the same time he is perhaps the best known composer of the Toronto group. Anyone who has glanced at TSO program notes has read an example of Ridout's prose. It seems unfortunate that these are more frequently by rather than about Godfrey Ridout.

He is one of the rare breed of native Torontonians; a pre-war native Torontonian, who can assure the music student that the artistic milieu in this city was not invented by the editors of Toronto Life in 1967. There was, in fact, an exceedingly active musical community during the thirties and forties. One of the most interesting aspects of Ridout's development as a composer are the influences on his compositional style. Toronto was obviously British oriented at that time, so it is not surprising that Holst, Elgar, Vaughan Williams, and of more recent vintage, William Walton, were musical touchstones. Ridout refers to himself as a "grand-pupil of Vaughan Williams," because one of his teachers, Ettore Mazzolini, studied with Vaughan Williams himself. The game of "influence influence, who's got the influence" seems to be a particular obsession in articles discussing Canadian composers. Ridout himself points out that "influence in these cases is rather strong — more like somebody you just grew up with. . . . The pattern begins to disintegrate when one considers that Ridout has used the serial principles of Arnold Schoenberg. An outstanding example is the second movement of the Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra (1974), in which a tone row is used as a sort of Cantus firmus."

This aspect of Ridout's technique is more surprising in the light of the fact that he is with regard especially to serialism, largely self-taught. Obviously he has studied formally — at U of T — but it was his own extensive reading which contributed to his cosmopolitanism as a composer, in addition to his post as a teacher of music history. Eclecticism is its own reward.

Ridout feels that the ability to compose is a gift. A teacher of composition is, in his mind, more or less a critic who can suggest improvements in details. Ridout won a scholarship to study with Healy Willan in 1938. "I used to play my things over for Healy and he'd stand looking out the window, and then turn and say something like 'Good. But don't you think, old boy, that the F should have come in a bar earlier . . .'"

I was surprised first by the validity of Ridout's conceptions while still a student composer and second at finding myself in the same room with someone who knew Willan well enough to refer to him by his first name. Ridout's compositions were good at this time. The Ballade for Viola and Orchestra was played by William Primrose on an NBC broadcast when Ridout was only twenty-two years old.

Ridout's output has included works in varying formats, with varying levels of intensity, for want of a better word. Ridout calls himself a traditional composer, and in some compositions this is a fair description, but even in the most conventional works there is at the same time a wit on one hand and a wistful, meditative quality on the other. This sense of contrast is most effective; the work which I think of immediately is Fall Fair, and his latest work, Kid's Stuff, for orchestra, which was first played last Feb. 20th. "Call it a 'piece' not an overture," says Ridout. In the bigger works Ridout's meditative aspect is linked with an intensity of emotion which is used to excellent effect; the Contiones Mysticae is an example.

Again we are brought face to face with the eclectic Mr. Ridout in respect to his sources: Pange Lingue for choir, text from the medieval Carmina Burana, Coronation Ode written for Queen Elizabeth's coronation, Folk Song of Eastern Canada for choir, the dissonant Etudes for String Orchestra, the Comedy Overture, and so forth.

The last piece mentioned is an early one. When Ridout played it for Willan, he mentioned that he had written something with a good vulgar tune. "Don't worry about being vulgar," said Willan, "worry about being dull." Ridout's work in general does have that element which lifts it from the realm of the academic. Whether this aspect concerns a dollop of vulgarity could be argued, but what it does concern, I think, is the communication of both wit and an emotional experience. The latter aspect in particular raises the music of Ridout to the realms of art.

The conditions under which a newspaper operates are usually too strict to provide an interesting persona beyond the printed pages. Usually there is a single guiding hand or perspective that rules the paper. Only when this rigid structure is dropped, with its consequent drop in standards of strictly journalistic quality, does the paper acquire a personality of complex subtleties and tensions.

For those curious of, rather than bored with it, The Varsity displays these interesting nuances because it lacks a single generating ideal. In fact the only thing which pervades the entire work is indulgence in its many forms. The most obvious indulgence is vanity, but the appearance of your byline soon begins to bore you (unless of course you move up to the masthead).

A much more important indulgence is the ability to project yourself onto the pages of the paper, whether that means preaching your politics, your aesthetics, your sense of humour, your interests of every sort. This indulgence is not necessarily a bad thing, but there are two obvious problems: standards of quality and audience taste. Both of these problems have concerned the staff of the Varsity very little, though for different reasons.

The Varsity is theoretically run on the basis of staff democracy. But, as in all democracies, the flow charts and constitutions look much better on paper. However, this (at least rhetorical) dedication to democratic principles produces quite a naive belief in equality: that all writing styles and opinions are equal, and all should appear in the paper. This is, of course, ludicrous. It is obvious that some students are brilliant stylists, more are mediocre, and more still can barely hold a pen properly. This also applies to intellect; all ideas are not created equal. Obviously standards of judgment originate with humans and are therefore imperfect, but that certainly does not mean they can be dispensed with.

But instead of confronting the very difficult problem of establishing and enforcing standards, many of the leaders at The Varsity take the easier way out and pay lip service to 'equality'. Those who have that extra degree of talent or intellect should be indulged, those of us who have less must work twice as hard to reach their standards, or rest content as observers.

The second problem with indulgence occurs when it involves (as it usually does) preaching. The Varsity has too often and for too long indulged in various self-righteous stances: the students at this university are considered unqualified to determine their own interests, so The Varsity overcomes this inadequacy. Basic interests of the students is a full-time profession even for many who claim to disdain such vacuous rhetoric. And the reason The Varsity can afford excessive evangelism is that it is virtually unchallenged as a campus newspaper; it has not found it necessary to indulge its readers, only its staffers. The Varsity's content should be shaped by a synthesis of campus opinion and staff opinion, but instead, only the latter is accounted for. And even in reflecting the latter it is radically imperfect.

Apathy and a necessary division of labour at The Varsity see to it that democracy is more theory than praxis. Major decisions, including editorial policy, are supposed to be made during regular staff meetings; but various factors, especially the difficulty of compromise, insure that the meetings are overly long and tedious, and therefore poorly attended. So even though the staff consists of almost 100 people, the paper is largely run by a small group. To expect anything more might be wishful thinking but to say that the content of the paper reflects staff opinion is misleading. And to say that the opinions of the small controlling group adequately represents the diversity of perspectives on campus is ludicrous. The Varsity is a resource that the University community no longer controls.

Dealing with such a tempestuous creature may be frustrating, but it is never dull. And I think that most outsiders would agree with that insiders judgment: The Varsity is not anywhere near as good a newspaper as Canada's largest and best (?) university should produce, but it's never dull. The editorial page has demonstrated that so well this year, proving alternately stupid, contemptible, shallow, ridiculous, amateurish, but never dull. Thank goodness for small virtues.

Rosalind Tureck's Bach: the pianist as hand-weaver

Myself, I'm not certain I have a critical theory. I do have certain critical principles. I believe a reviewer's job is to elucidate (as best he or she can manage) the content of a work, and to appraise its success or failure in achieving its own statement. I'm not certain to what extent a critic's business is to challenge the ideas and the artist being reviewed (as opposed to challenging the careless presentation of those ideas, or applauding painstaking care); I am reasonably certain no critic should challenge an artist's ideas until she or he has first demonstrated a reasonably thorough comprehension of them; and I am equally certain that the fact that one may be at odds with the ideas of an artist (supposing one has first understood them) is in no sense an aesthetic argument against the work. The fact that one finds an argument flawed, careless or balanced unfairly against conflicting ideas — those are all valid challenges in aesthetics; but one can perceive these flaws in an argument for a position that one agrees with. (There are probably also of course ideas so absurd that to put them forward seriously is to be guilty already of sloppy aesthetics.)

All of which may be spectacularly irrelevant to the terms of this particular review, since the work I am reviewing, Bach's Goldberg Variations as lovingly interpreted by Rosalyn Tureck, can be said to have an "argument" only in the most abstract sense. (Although I have listened while a Marxist music critic exhausted half an evening at a party arguing for the stern proletarian rhythms of Beethoven over the bourgeois, even aristocratic influences of Mozart and Bach.) And I certainly don't know enough technically about music to discuss the musical ideas that may no doubt percolate through every note of the Goldberg Variations. And in a way that's kind of nice, because it allows the opportunity to talk purely and naively about the richness and beauty of an artistic experience without dwelling on considerations timely and irrelevant.

Certainly Bach, well performed, is a rich and beautiful experience, and he was superbly performed by pianist Tureck in her concert Sunday night in the Edward Johnson Building. What is true of the Goldberg Variations is true as well of any other major Bach piece that I have heard performed — listening to Bach is very much analogous to studying with one's fingers an intricate lace tapestry and admiring at once the delicacy of the fabric employed, and the complexity of the interweave. The subtle repetition of themes, patterns and signatures provides an endless delight. And to watch Bach played on the piano evokes this idea in another way as well. The fingers as they move in quick complicated moves over the keys, the hands as they criss-cross over and under each other, give the impression of an elegant pattern being woven in the air above the ivories.

(One general critical rule of mine is to avoid reviews which become extended metaphors, since such a review frequently degenerates into eighth-rated poetry, and is rarely satisfactory as criticism. I'm breaking that rule here because the Goldberg Variations as a total work is really an extended metaphor itself in musical terms, and so to explicate it through a similar metaphor does not seem a violation.)

If we think of the Goldberg Variations in their entirety as a massive tapestry spread out to its full length, with supports, in the open air, with a gentle breeze stirring it from time to time to send new echoes and resonances through its designs, we get an idea of the multiplicit effect the work has upon the memory. The subtlest repetitions and variations that are concretely expressible are in the tapestry already, but subtler echoes yet appear in the intangible flow of the wind through the weave. It is as if the art of the tapestry is to incorporate the rhythms of the incorporeal wind into its own design. Bach's music is sometimes described as mechanical, but it seems to me that at its finest it flows with a rhythm inexplicable as mere technique (however accomplished the technique). It is this precise quality in great music that is so difficult to capture, and never is, except by the most gifted performers. The mechanical difficulties of Bach are tremendous, the dexterity required of the fingers, for example, is incredible. But it is possible to master all that, even to play flawlessly from that aspect, and still not capture in fullness what is there. To make the wind move through the tapestry the musician must command all that technique for sure, but also must respond with her whole soul to the soul of the music of Bach, and it is from this aspect that Rosalyn Tureck's interpretation deserves the highest praise.

With this turkey, Major can open a poultry farm

Thomas Fuller once observed: "A bad workman never gets a good tool." Perhaps Leon Major, artistic director of the Toronto Arts Productions and his literary manager, Peter Wyldie had failed in selecting a proper vehicle for the talents of their organization. Then again, perhaps they were bad workmen. Which was it to be? Inconsistencies ruled supreme not only in the current production of Scapin but in all TAP's expensive sojourns at the St. Lawrence Centre. After a few minutes spent milling about the opening night reception I rapidly became convinced that the latter alternative was closer to the truth. Members of an incestuous cultural commune hovered in the upper lounge congratulating each other on "Putting on the play", while dozens of disgruntled paying patrons pushed at the other bars, those located beneath the exit signs.

It wasn't that there was nothing of value in Albert Millaire's production of Scapin, Moliere's comedy concerning fiscal hypocrisy. It was simply that the quality was contradicted in quantity by incompetence. Earlier highlights in the season, Douglas Rain's stunning performance as Hatch, the manically mad cutter in Edward Bond's The Sea and Dixie Seattle's sensitive portrayal of the mute Katrina in Major's muddy attempt at Mother Courage had both been surrounded by generally inconsistent technical and artistic efforts.

Similarly in Scapin one played witness to the tragedy of Allan Royal's valiant attempt at the lead role of the valet and Murray Lauffer's stunning cartoon cut out set being placed beside blatant miscasting in the supporting roles, a stilted and confused translation, a directorial conceit in which a commedia dell'arte troop paraded ludicrously about continually knocking over a false proscenium in a failed attempt at humour and sprouting commedia lazzi at a mystified audience, and something even more stilted, music whose lyrics have not seen their match in even most simplistic British Music Hall routine.

People who sincerely wish to be true must, I think, contradict themselves less than those who try to be "consistent". Consequently, I shall try to be honest in my plea. Although this may not be the most politic pursuit, it is one which is desperately needed. After eight seasons of generally inadequate productions at the St. Lawrence, surely someone must have noticed that the theatrical world is a round gulf in which those who cannot swim (Leon Major) must drag along the bottom. What are the odds against a ninth chance for Mr. Major? None at all. Already another season is planned and no doubt more inconsistencies are due. "But" says the civil servant at the Canadian Arts Council to the patron who pays Mr. Major's salary both through taxes and box office receipts, glasses primed, smile desperately secured, "Just because they have been inconsistent once, or often, does not mean that they always will be." Does it. Eight years have been spent waiting and hoping. Each year the wait becomes longer. Each year the hope is less.

Spratt's pat; play's gray

Jack Spratt is precisely the sort of man one dreads meeting at the next cocktail party: the punchy little salesman with the lousy one-liners and the godawful knack of agreeing with everything that's said in order to avoid all potential conflict. Pressed against the wall, you find him pathetic and despicable every time and pray that he'll remove his slimy self quickly. The last thing to cross your mind is that his life might inspire a play, but it has.

Spratt, former Winnipeg journalist Joe Wiesenfeld's first play currently showing at the Tarragon Theatre, revolves around one such character and it's about failure — human beings who have, for the most part, failed at their lives and show no signs of ever altering their morbid state. It's also about responsibility, of which Spratt doesn't even have a thimbleful.

The Tarragon's production is worth seeing, if only to watch Neil Munro's vibrant performance as Spratt. Wiesenfeld's Spratt is, like the other characters in the play, largely a cliché, but Munro gives the cardboard cut-out volume and colour. It's like following a comic strip character develop from paper into cartoon and whereas you never actually feel any emotion for him (after all, what great feelings can be stirred by a man whose love for his wife dissipated along with her physical beauty?), you do watch the process with fascination.

Munro's Spratt has the 10-second attention span of a child, as well as all the pipe dreams, and it's no great surprise when he's charged with having sexual intercourse with the feeble-minded. When his wife Dorrie complains that her possibly cancerous ovarian cysts are painful, a spastic Spratt brags that the pain is due to his too-large penis. Similarly, he suggests she remove the cysts in a tone one reserves for putting out the cat.

Barbara Gordon's Dorrie is a dumpy, whining personality. In the first act she established her stereotype, a dull and intellectually incompetent woman, and when she showed a glimmer of perception about herself and her husband in act two, it was seen as more of an aberration than a personality unfolding. She had no dignity, but was it also necessary that she be pigeon-toed?

Roderick Hillier's futuristic set design is initially a shock, but it develops into an apt foil. The large slabs of granite are cold and the central sloped platform causes the players to be pulled downward with each step. It's the physical equivalent of the prison that Wiesenfeld's characters have built for themselves and works remarkably, if depressingly, well.

I have seen the future of architecture and you still get change from your dollar

Ah, the subtle ironies of the progress of civilization. Who would have thought that in 1978, university students in their never-ending pursuit of petroleum based foods, would struggle, half-starved, up a ramp into a restaurant in downtown Toronto and, unbeknownst to themselves, be, in fact, struggling up a ramp which can in itself be seen as the Omega of Western Civilization's evolutionary process in that amazingly relevant and, dare I say it, large field of the visual arts known as architecture.

That's right, the McDonald's situated on Bloor Street, across from the Royal Conservatory of Music, must be viewed, if not as an architectural wonder in itself, at least as symbolic representative of the architectural highlights of this century. Allow me to illustrate. As one enters the double glass doors of this imposing edifice, one is immediately aware of one thing, glass doors. This concentration, and perhaps even fetish with glass can easily be traced to the mid-work of F. Lloyd Wright. Witness the second-storey back wall of the Kaufman house. Indeed that monumental ground-breaking structure's intimacy with its natural milieu is, in part, captured here, though MacDonalds substitutes the waterfall with an artificial grotto. This entire process is an attempt to create an illusion of space while giving the hamburger munching patrons an ego-boosting sense of superiority by making sure that they are warm and snug inside while the other poor suckers outside are freezing. It is known as the "goldfish principle". The people eating the hamburgers are the fish.

The interior of the building reads like a winning list of the 'great architects of this century contest.' Wright, the Palladio of the twentieth century, is again echoed in the use of ferro-concrete and large vertical spaces, here delineated by long hanging lamps, to give an illusion of roominess. Imagine a telephone booth forty feet high. Le Corbusier, on a smaller scale, is paid tribute to in the primarily vertical emphasis of the building, the elaborate use of expendable space (witness the area above the line-ups) and of course, the ever prominent use of glass. And what about the exposed brick, concrete, heating ducts and lighting fixtures? Why its Berlage, that innovative Dutchman, all over again. Remember the Amsterdam Stock Exchange? Also hinted at are Horta (the rounded edges, and the chairs which have to be considered nouveau), Perret, Loos, Hendrik, Poelzig (the idea of this building being used for selling hamburgers is easily as surreal as the Great Theatre interior), Aalto and, of course, Breuer.

Ostracized from this building are the influence of the works by the overly fashionable who, swept away by an artistic rage, be it Dadaism or Expressionism, built flowerly superfluous structures whose only value lay in their defiance of zoning laws. Thus, nowhere to be found are the frills of Gaudi, the half-baked aspirations of Sant'ella, the convulsive curves of Niemeyer, the inherent lunacy of Kiesler or the bubble-brained notions of fuller.

So there you have it. The next time you haul your boney carcass over to McDonalds to satiate some primitive appetite, try and have the common decency, or at least a respectable sense of irony (the first sign of an awakening artistic consciousness), and notice, when you're not grovelling in sterilized cow flesh and that viscous fluid known as "special sauce", that you are surrounded by a building of immediate historical value. You, and twenty-four billion other people are being served in a monument to the Big Macs of the wonderful world of architecture.

Ubu no boo-boo, scooby-doo!

It's amazing how many people get confused by a band like Pere Ubu, who played at the Horseshoe tavern last Monday night. There were those from Toronto's more prominent punk bands who had to disagree on political grounds ("Play rock'n'roll"). However, the best that Ubu's fans could suggest was a tribute to Syd Barrett. The audience was unprepared for their subtleties.

Pere Ubu's music is structured over blues-based guitar, bass and drums. I say based because they've left their base far behind. The riffs are intricate but sparse, leaving plenty to the imagination while at the same time being imaginative and matter of factly bizarre.

On top of this is thrown a synthesizer player who uses raw sounds better than any I've ever heard. He also had a real accompanist's mentality. His parts weren't brought out obviously, they were just snuck in around the singer's lines.

The lead singer is a two-hundred and fifty pound man in a dark blue suit and red tie, keeping time with a hammer on a piece of iron pipe. His name is Crocus Bohemeth and his voice is equal parts sound, squeal and Cleveland (their home). His lyrics are often chant-like, also blues-based, and again inspiring in an unrecognizable way.

The show included alternated sets by Toronto's B-Girls and The Suicide Commandos, a band from Milwaukee.

The B-Girls were received like the clumsy adorable band they were. They giggled when something went wrong, kept on with only one guitarist when someone broke a string, and generally had fun. And they were fun.

The Commandos started their set with a very strong original song and versions of She (originally performed by the Monkees) and Little Red Book (by Love). They had a sense of humour, were fast, loud, and poppy, with good hooks and a strong bassist and drummer. Unfortunately, they also had a guitarist who was incredibly boring and who got that look in his eyes that means "Power, Power". Just another Midwest pop band who can't resist a lack of subtlety and who have started listening to their own terrible lyrics.

The B-Girls got good response at the simple, patronizing level they wanted. The Suicide Commandos got boring. Pere Ubu kept you on your mental toes and got on your mental nerves. And they were the only ones who let their music speak for itself.

IN PAPERBACK FROM BANTAM

Straight Time warped

Straight Time is a slight but enjoyable movie. If it wasn't for Dustin Hoffman's performance as Max Dembo, it would be a routine, run of the mill, made for TV action melodrama (the kind of movie that you can't take your eyes off at this time of year — because if you do you'll have to write the two essays that were due on March 15).

Max is an ex-convict who has just been released from prison after serving six years for armed robbery. Hoffman gets inside the psyche of this well meaning, thin-skinned, sensitive and quick-tempered bungler. Hoffman makes us believe in Max's earnest desire to go straight and his quest for "normality". Yet we can also see what draws him back: his resentment of the time he spent in prison, his impatience with the kind of job and home he can expect as an ex-con, and the familiarity and excitement of a life of crime. Hoffman burns a tense, tight portrayal out of the conflicting elements in this crucible.

The screenplay, by Alvin Sargent, Edward Bunker, and Jeffrey Boam, alternates between scenes that are original and comically inventive and scenes that are pretentious, irritating and confusing.

One example of the latter is the scene where Max tells his girl that he's a fugitive. She replies "I'll stick with you as long as I can handle the scene." With dialogue like this, you'd think that screenwriters only spoke to their wives through their psychiatrists at group therapy sessions.

This picture has elements of prison films like Cool Hand Luke and Longest Yard as well as the standard elements of every action movie that Burt Reynolds has ever appeared in. When he first meets his parole officer, we can believe the mixture of condescension and adherence to arbitrary rules with which the parole officer treats Max. However, this soon develops into the full-blown sadism of Eddie Albert in the Longest Yard.

These days (yawn), heterosexual tendencies of the hero must be catalogued in spite of the fact that no sex is really necessary. As the obligatory object of his sexual desires, Theresa Russell saves Dustin Hoffman from going blind.

Their relationship goes like this: She was his woman—He was her man—He done wrong—He drove off into the sunset in a Plymouth—and he was gone.

There is, of course, the customary Freudian scene which appears to explain Hoffman's defiant behaviour in terms of Theresa Russell's left breast which appears alone on the screen with a pre-natal looking Hoffman lying woefully beside it.

And then there's the swimming pool. Sitting beside his Jacuzzi, in full view of his ranch-style split level home (obtained through the paint contracting business), a former burglar and friend of Hoffman's says "You've got to get me out of here," as he agrees to join Hoffman in a Bank job.

If you're down to five essays, two seminars, three tests and two exams and you "gotta get outta here" then head over to the Towne Cinema. After all, Dustin Hoffman may be too short to marry but he's not too short to fool around with.

Social polemics ruin historiography

Uncovering the past can be seen as a legitimate duty to the future, an attempt to escape from the constraints of received as opposed to demonstrated knowledge. Historiography tends to proceed within generally accepted frameworks, and as biography this book adheres to them. But it also commits the cardinal sin of hagiography, it preaches.

Mary Shadd, daughter of a freed Negro in the slave state of Delaware, was born in Wilmington in 1823 or 1824 and moved, as a schoolteacher, to Windsor, Canada West, in 1851. There she became involved in the abolitionist movement, schemes to encourage mass immigration into Canada for freed slaves, a protagonist in the complicated politics of the Refugee Home Society and eventually entered the newspaper world.

Following the civil war Shadd returned to Washington where she earned the right to practise law and turned her still-considerable energies to woman's suffrage. To the end of her life in 1893 she appears to have been a tough-minded woman with considerable powers of reason and speech.

The material of this woman's life is of interest to a wide range of readers, but in fact the authors have allowed their style to limit that potential audience by the insertion of non-contemporary polemics concerning the role of women in today's society. These remarks are written without sensitivity of humour and constitute in my opinion an insult to the thoughtful reader who can undertake his own conclusions. The solid investigation which fills the central segments of the volume — the interrelationships of church and politics in the black society of Canada in the 1850's and 1860's — is dwarfed, in retrospect, by the bloody-mindedness of the inserted matter. Shadd is the life of a fascinating woman, one whose career and milieu is worthy of insertion in the mythopoetic history of Ontario. But it is not a life which should be surrounded by social dogmatism alien to its subject. Using legitimate historiography further research would result in a less flawed portrait of Mary Shadd Carey.

Watsup

classical

Well, the summer looks like it's going to be a pig-out for opera fans. Starting the season at the end of the month, the little known but spectacularly obscure Vatican Boys Choir will perform Mozart's esoteric Magic Bassoon in Rome. Count me in. And for fans of the Italian genre, the CabbageTown Opera Co. is planning a low-budget production of the entire Wagner Ring Cycle in June. It is to be performed with a three-piece orchestra in Greenwood Park.

For fans of more intimate forms of music, my favorites the Guggenbooger Quartet (Lute, oboe, recorder and Luxo lamp) will give an intimate recital of Handel's Hedge Music at Hart House next week. The public is not invited. And the Schumann Memorial Trio will be opening for the Dead Boys at the New Yorker next week.

Finally, let's talk soloists. Helmer Tarzan, the famed Finnish triangler will be performing his own transcription of Tchaikovsky's first piano concerto onto triangle at the St. Lawrence a week Sunday. And John Cage announces that he will not give a concert at Massey Hall on the 15th of June. Admission is $7.50.

Thanks this year go to Dorothy Mary Jo, Martin, Jim, Les, Grace, Louise, and Paul for writing this Watsup.

movies

April 2, 1978
Sleep E-Z motel

Kim, you jerk:

Well, alright, it seemed like a good idea at the time. I know that movies are dying in Toronto and all those rumours about the real buffery taking place in small-town Ontario should have inflamed the nostrils of any newshound. Yeah, sure. Do you know what it's like out here? Give me the front line in the next war.

Anyway, I started out on Friday in Pictou, chasing down some report that a demented Prince Edward County potato magnate had bought up all of the surviving prints of Metal Meshah and was showing them to his pigs to increase their fat percentage. On the bus I was sitting behind this pair of Siamese twins (joined at the knee and elbow) who were jabbering away in French about this deal they were going to make. "Ce film sera le nouveau Johnny Guitart!" sez one. "Ah oui, Luc, tous les étudiants du film l'aimeront." "D'accord Jean, ils sont comme les cochons. Ils mangent n'importe quoi." "Et puis, ils font des films et les envoient à l'Amérique out tout le monde les mangent comme la merde."

And then I get this press release from the C.F.D.C. proudly announcing that "that underground classic, the sixties movie about the seventies Metal Meshah will be Canada's official entry at the Cannes festival." They wouldn't leak a thing in Ottawa. This secretary, who looked for a Querrelles St. Jacques, snapped shut when I asked. No sense casting pearls I suppose.

I did discover, though, that Pierre Trudeau schedules private screenings of Teorema and Something For Everyone before all cabinet meetings.

And then there was the report that the Ospringe Public Library had the only print of Von Stroheim's epic sequel to Greed, Lust an eight and a half hour picaresque starring Zazu Pitts, Max Schreck, and Tarreo Labreya. No luck there either. The head librarian, who looked like Joe Dellasandro as played by Hayley Mills fifty pounds since flashed me a mouthful of the local denturist's Friday afternoon discount special, fiddled with the third button of her blouse and asked what a nice boy like me could possibly know about lust.

All of a sudden the Second Church of Christ the Unlikely in Meaford with its Sunday night programme of the collected spiritual messages of Oral Roberts seemed to be drawing me with the strength of a promised revelation.

It turns out that this seemingly innocent religious society is a cover for an errant sect of theosophical masons who worship the garters of Madame Blavatsky. I can't say I wasn't warned. The waitress in the coffee shop across the road, when she wasn't spilling my tea or bending low to mop it up told me that it wasn't safe. She warned me that I shouldn't meddle where I wasn't wanted and ought to head back to Toronto before it was too late.

More or less undaunted, and figuring that if the masons didn't get me her trucker boyfriend would, I ducked out. The church basement window was open (aren't they always) and I found myself in a darkened room filled with fez-bearing figures huddled about a small screen watching a silent print of W. B. Yeats dressed as Memnon discussing the mythic and possibly sodomical coupling of the Golden Compass and the Sun. All the locals drooled in time with the title cards and I began to think that the nuns back at St. Simon's were dead right. At which point a shriek of "Papist, there's a demon Papist in the room!" rang out. And assuming that Father O'Noonagan (Pat O'Brien) was not behind me, I ran only to find the waitress outside with some tale of her younger sister making religious films for some aberrant sect of blood, soil, and alpha-wave worshipping ex-Scientologists. She's locked out on some farm just this side of Oswego and is forced to pose as a Sadean Charlotte Corday to L. Ron Hubbard's Marat. And, it seems, I'm just the boy to crack the racket. Sure, I said, "But I'm sure you'll help poor ruined Elvira. She hasn't had anyone to protect her since Billy died." Billy? I said, "Yes, poor Billy, he was carrying a work print of Fast Company when he ran across Mr. Mund." Mr. Mund? I said, "Yes, Mr. Mund, the man who has a heart like a reel and blood of molten acetate..."

Thanks a bundle Kim. We're in this motel outside of Bracebridge registered as Mr. and Mrs. Camelman. She's out searching for a one-eyed dwarf who worked as key grip on the film Hitchcock made with James Dean and Greta Garbo in 1962 the only print of which is now in the Vatican Library. I may not be home for dinner, and please, tell Laura I love her.

Hope you go out like Edward II.

John Wilson is in Ottawa, Spring is in the air, and I am chained to this typewriter. Still, it's going to be a big month for theatre in Toronto. Rumour has it that that frizzy-haired female Annie has relinquished the limelight, and has recently been seen in the company of a certain well-known merchant banker. Replacing her will be Mim Carole Pope, chanteuse extraordinaire.

As soon as Annie leaves the stage, the O'Keefe will continue its policy of bringing you the best in today's theatre by importing from England The Fabulous Bachelors. Appearing alongside the Pre-Fab Four will be The World Renowned Judy Moxon, perhaps Europe's finest foot juggler.

Toronto Arts Production continues with its policy of bringing Kulture to the Masses, starting April 10, combining haute cuisine with haute culture. This series, entitled Theatre Dinner, has been presented in conjunction with a generous grant from Swanson's (and we don't mean Gloria).

Well those are the scoops for this week. This is Joanna saying "have a good summer" on behalf of Neil who's saying "huggies and kisses" from John Wilson. Thanks go out to all the theatre reviewers who put pen to paper over the last eight months. If any of you out there feel like theatre reviewers next September, stop pop into the Review office. See ya next year.

jazz

Hello Jazz Fans!!! The city heats up this week as one of the better known traditional musicians of the Lester Young — Art Tatum — Muamar Kalashala tradition brings his talents to Massey Hall tomorrow night. Joe Lamont, percussionist for such notables as Plas Johnson and the Philadelphia Hot Five, will perform his latest improvisations on solo snare drum at 8 p.m. Lamont has taken the technique of controlled monotony, first exploited so well by John Coltrane in My Favorite Things, to its artistic conclusion, managing to create the simultaneous effect of three or more snare drums through the judicious use of drumsticks, elbows, teeth, ears and spittle on the single drum. Tickets: $10, students $11.

Catch Sonny Greenwich this week at Yellowfingers, followed next week by Marty Morell.

At Bourbon St., Lee Knoltz (alto) plays until the weekend.

Cafe Soho continues to attract big name talents. This weekend after hours features the fine tenor work of John Coltrane, with Duke Ellington and the orchestra coming in on Sunday for the afternoon concert. The Duke's performance represents a welcome comeback following his recent death.

Improvisational mastermind Bob Klotz will perform on flute with supreme cello technician Eric del Junco at various times and places during the summer until we are moved on by the cops. Bills in the flute case, change in the cello case. Happy holidays and goodbye Jazz Fans!!!

rock

Seconds into minutes and minutes into daze. Amazing how the year has slipped by. But amidst the dour drudgery of essay extensions, exhaustion and exams, there is a guiding light; the summer concerts. And here we have the up to the minute rumours about the big sounds that are coming yer way in the big Cabbage this season...

Well it looks like my numero uno heroes have finally remembered this fair city. Demigods Kiss are negotiating for a concert sometime in June. It seems they're holding out for the Eaton Centre. And the semi-scheduled May Pink Floyd concert is running into problems. Floyd wants to raise the roof of the Gardens so they can fly in a Starfighter jet painted like a super-sonic jet to strafe the audience with teeny rubber sheep. Elsewhere, Fleetwood Mac should be playing Howard Johnson's early next month. Free ice cream for the little ones. And several world-wide concert promoters are trying to throw together a deal to bring together Janis Joplin, Jimi Hendrix, Marc Holan, Jim Croce and Lynard Skynard. The only tie up so far has to do with health regulations.

And yes! the Beatles are intending a reunion this summer, indeed, possibly this month. The Fab Four have made definite plans as they put it, to have "supper together sometime." President of the international Beatles Fan Club, Elanur Rigby, is waxing eloquent over the impending event and is confident that, "even if the boys only lunch, you know, soup and sandwiches, it will be the greatest musical event of the decade!"

hopping. Stinger is at the B House tonight, Madducks is at the Neo-colonial, Bon is at Harry's Hideaway, Harbinger is at the Boob, Schloxy is at the Dickolodeon, Mush is at the Tounge Station, Hedge is at the Chimbley and Godot hasn't shown up yet. For you lovers of folk, Hope Full and the Harp Seals are at Nervous Disorder this evening. And on the western front, this Friday, Dr. John's is featuring an accordion player and a dancing bear.

But enough. It's been a swell year and many thanks are extended to my little helpers. Special thanks to Ann, Daryl, Dpat Rats Kevin, Heather, Steve. Special thanks to BJ and especially special thanks to left-hand man, Neil Michael Davidson who will be taking over this aspicuous position next year.

It's been a slice kids. Over and out.

... in which the Toronto art scene banishes your humble reviewer for the summer...

Hart House features the sculptures and prints of Dieter Hastenteufel till April 21, to be followed by Toronto Scenes by Luigi Bellini (not the Bellini) opening April 25. That's it for spring at the old alma mater, and the year has been eclectically virtuous. York's Samuel J. Zacks Gallery is bristling with the work of the New York School prodigy, John A. Schwetzer, but continues only till Friday. The Meeting Place Gallery at Scarborough College has drawings from the Nuances series by Salvatore A. Amenta till April 14.

The continuing exhibitions at the AGO include Melvin Charney's architectural projects (a tight squeeze), and the Alechinsky retrospective, both till April 30. Robert Holmes's watercolours are showing till April 23, but the theme exhibition Heroes and Heroines is the most playful and dramatic of the shows, though patently educational.

In order to open and close the year with a bid for realism, I would recommend the Madison Gallery exhibition Dimensions of Realism in which Canadian painters, Tom Forrestal and Tom La Pierre throw in the dice with two Italian painters, Armando De Stefano and Gigino Falconi. It continues till April 12 and is a useful introduction to innocuous Forrestal and his more vernal contemporaries.

The Yaneff Gallery's Master Drawings exhibition opening on Friday has some alluring pieces by Augustus John and masses works by Picasso, Matine, Moore, Pissarro, Leger, Corot, Rodin, Whistler, and other household names. There's more Picasso at the Albert White Gallery and there's more 20th century genius at the Gallery Moos in the works of Gershon Iskowitz (till April 6).

The Alpha Omega Women are sponsoring an Art Show and Sale on Saturday April 15 and Sunday April 16 at the Civic Garden Centre, Edwards Gardens. Your leftover OSAP funds would be well spent but you'll have trouble evading the swath of artistic big games in the crowd, such as A. J. Casson and Ken Danby. Admission is $2 per person.

All of which brings us round to Annie's Annual Art Analysis. We all know it's been a "wild and crazy" year for art — the Lawren Harris Retrospective at the AGO, a plethora of videotarts, and an introduction of art to cinema with Rasky's first-run "Homage to Chagall, and art to subway in the new Spadina line. The future is frightening... Art meets Godzilla!...

Trinity Regains Intramural Prize

By JIM O'LEARY

After narrowly losing the T.A. Reed trophy last year, the people from Trinity College felt they had something to prove this season.

Last year initial indications were that Trinity had won the prestigious award, presented annually to the college or faculty that wins the most points in the intramural standings. After a recount, however, the trophy went to Scarborough College.

This year there were no mistakes as Trinity achieved their revenge by beating Scarborough for the top spot in Division One by accumulating 11,709 points. Scarborough finished second with 10,690.

In Division Two, Dentistry won the award for only the second time since its inception 32 years ago by accumulating 11,527 points. Knox College was the runner-up with 10,399.

Points for the T.A. Reed trophy are awarded on the basis of participation and results. A college with high participation in the intramural program will receive points regardless of their won-lost record. The college which combines high participation with athletic excellence stands the best chance of winning the trophy.

A ratio system is used rather than a straight point system to determine the winners so as to compensate for the discrepancy in the size of the various colleges and faculties. By this means all colleges have an equal chance to win the top prize.

Trinity led in the standings all year. At the Christmas break they were ahead of Scarborough by over 1,400 points.

For Trinity, this marked the eighth time they have taken the award and moved them into sole possession of second place in the all time standings. Engineering presently holds the top spot with 12 wins.

To place them to the win, Trinity got championship performances from their soccer and volleyball teams. Also, they placed hockey, squash, track and soccer teams in the respective finals.

The secret to their success however, lies more in the fact that they are able to solicit high participation from the students on their campus. The point system is purposely geared to reward participation as much as winning.

Scarborough College had an impressive record to take second place. They had champions in football, lacrosse and squash as well as runner-ups in soccer, hockey, basketball and volleyball.

Dentistry's win was their first since the 1965-66 season. Like Trinity, they also led their division at the Christmas break with a lead of more than 1,000 points over the School of Graduate Studies.

Dentistry's strength lay in their championship soccer team. They also had finalists in football and volleyball.

Knox's second-place finish was largely due to their strength in the pool. They had both the champion and runner-up water polo teams as well as the runner-up in swimming.

Side Line By-Line

By JIM O'LEARY

One of the most unenviable jobs at this university is held by Director of Athletics "Bud" Fraser. Besides the fact that the department of athletics is reeling under the pressure of cutbacks, Fraser has also had the burden of trying to be mediator of a department which is showing signs of unrest.

To reell an old tale, the department of athletics is a new institution at the U of T. In the past, athletics was run by four independent bodies with separate departments for men and women. Last year, however, these four departments were amalgamated much to the displeasure of some.

The problems originally predicted for the combined department became even worse over the year as it became obvious that the pie just wasn't big enough to feed everyone and that some people were going to have to leave the table hungry.

Next year, the department will be smaller as a number of people are not going to be invited back to help split up the goodies.

According to one of the people who is being laid off, morale in the department is very low. Staff are upset at the way things have gone this year and can't see it getting any better next year.

This person is particularly upset that staff are being cut while the department maintains, what he considers, an overstaffed administrative body. He points out that when the new athletic complex opens in 1979 it's going to take a lot of staff to run things and that the course being followed is going to be regretted in the near future.

Another complaint is that, very often, for reasons unknown to him, personnel are often shifted to positions in which they are not well qualified and ignored for positions they are more qualified to occupy. He tells of his own case where he was told he did not qualify for a certain position before his qualifications were even considered and then was assigned to a post where his qualifications were at best very limited.

According to this person, the U of T is a school of losers and will remain this way so long as it continues to assign people in this manner. This university is one of the very few around that doesn't replace losing coaches, according to him.

Of course, all these complaints have to be weighed since they are coming from a soon to be unemployed person who is obviously bitter. Nevertheless, there seems to be merit to some of the grievances.

One of the main reasons for the amalgamation of the departments was to streamline procedures and eliminate overlapping. But a quick look at the administrative hierarchy shows that for each of the four departments there is both an administrator and an associate administrator. Furthermore, in each case the administrator is a male and the associate a female, giving the appearance that the departments have been joined in name only.

There also seems to be justification for the complaints about low morale. All year there have been signs of dissatisfaction within the ranks. Just last week wrestling coach Joe Rabel announced his resignation citing frustration with the administration as one of the reasons.

It was obvious way back in September that some people were determined that amalgamation was bad and they weren't going to co-operate. Others saw amalgamation as an opportunity to make gains for their own department and the hell with everyone else.

Both these views have made problems worse throughout the department. Many coaches are unhappy, there has been competition between departments instead of co-operation. Meetings have often centered around heckpicking as the members of various committees and sub-committees spend a lot of time criticizing the budget and programs of others without offering constructive criticism as to how improvements could be made.

Unfortunately for the students, this behind-the-scenes haggling is going to be reflected in programs next year. Cutbacks are old news. They are a fact of life that have to be lived with. In order to minimize the effect of cutbacks though, it will take a concerted effort by everyone in the department.

This means that when the staff and administrators sit down at the meeting table they must consider first what is best for the students and stop trying to score points in their own personal battles.

Next year will be difficult for the Athletic Department. For Fraser, this means his job will become even more difficult than it has been this year.

Good luck Bud.

Top Prize For Dave Watt

By JIM O'LEARY

Dave Watt is the 1978 winner of the most prestigious athletic award presented by the U of T. At the annual awards banquet last Tuesday, Watt was presented with the Thomas R. Loudon Award which is presented annually "to the person at the university, either student or member of the staff, for outstanding service in the advancement of athletics."

Watt has had an outstanding athletic career at U of T. He has competed intercollegiate for both the basketball and track and field teams. In 1972-73 he won the W.A. Potter Trophy as the most valuable player on the basketball team.

The next year, Watt won the George M. Biggs trophy for his contribution to university athletics "from the standpoint of leadership, sportsmanship and performance."

Watt has been most prominent in track and field. As well as winning numerous awards for U of T in his five years of eligibility, he has also competed nationally and internationally.

Watt has competed mainly in jumping events with the triple jump as his specialty. He has been defending outdoor triple jump champion for the last six years and indoor champ for the last five. He has also been the Canadian record holder since 1975.

Internationally, Watt has competed in the world student games in 1974, the Pan-American games in 1975, and in many dual meets.

As well as his competitive excellence Watt also has a fine administrative record. He is presently a coach and administrator of the U of T track club and is chairman of the excellence committee of the department of athletics.

Watt has completed his masters and is presently working towards his doctorate in economics.

In another prestigious presentation, Bob Boracks received the George M. Biggs trophy. Boracks is the person given most of the credit for rejuvenating rowing at U of T.

He has put in many long hours which this year paid off as the U of T captured first place in the Ontario Universities Athletic Association (OUAA) championship. Boracks was the captain of the undefeated lightweight team and also served on the excellence committee as well as being prominent in Erindale sports.

Mike Steele and Paul McMillan were the winners of the football awards. Steele won the Johnny Copp trophy which is awarded to "the member of the senior football team adjudged worthiest," while McMillan took the James A. Bennet Memorial trophy for his exemplification of "desire and courage against insurmountable odds."

Steele was a team captain, OUAA all-star and a member of the Canadian team that played in the Can-Am Bowl. McMillan rebounded from two serious leg injuries to earn OUAA all-star recognition.

Rocci Pagnello was the winner of the Dr. B. Dafeo trophy which is presented to the member of the senior hockey team "who in the opinion of his team mates is most deserving." This past season, Pagnello has been an OUAA all-star, all-Canadian and a member of the Canadian Student National team.

For the third time in his five year career, Doug Fox won the Dr. W. A. Potter trophy as the most valuable player on the basketball team.

OUAA wrestling champion, Jack Preobrazenski, won the Kirk Wipper trophy for his outstanding performances over the year.

In swimming, John Watt won the Bickle Award, which is presented to the swimmer who combines "character, scholarship and general interest."

Other winners were Derek Wulff (most improved gymnast), Rolie Hamar (Golf), Peter Uremovich (soccer), Enzo Federico (Rugby), John Cooper (Water polo) and Terry Poulos for his outstanding contribution to intramural athletics.

Internal Affairs Answers Student Objections

By JIM O'LEARY

The department of Athletics heard some good news yesterday when it was revealed that Internal Affairs has called a special meeting to reconsider their request for a $2 fee increase.

The decision to hold another meeting came after Internal Affairs was inundated with hundreds of letters and petitions following their decision of March 20 which refused the Department of Athletics permission to implement a $2-fee increase for St. George campus students. The letters revealed that students were more than willing to pay an extra $2 rather than see programs eliminated.

Director of Athletics, A.J. "Bud" Fraser was obviously pleased that his department was to be given another chance to present its case. "I appreciate Internal Affairs re-opening the case. It's great that they responded to the students like this," he said.

The meeting will be held tomorrow at 4 pm in the Council Chamber of Simcoe Hall. Any student who wishes to make a presentation may have the opportunity to do so if he gets the permission of the chairman.

This will be the last chance for those who don't want to see programs such as the instruction and fitness programs eliminated, to let their feelings be known. The meeting is open and even if you have nothing to say your presence could be instrumental in the final decision.
